Antiquity of ritual. This high estimate of the important functions which ceremonial was designed to fulfil, seems supported by the references to it which will be found in Holy Scripture. There it will be discovered, firstly, to have existed in different forms from the very earliest ages, and, secondly, always to have met with the Divine approval, even where it was not based with all its minutiæ on the injunctions of Almighty God Himself. The institution of the Sabbath and its hallowing as a day of rest is coeval with the creation itself, and its observance was to be a perpetual witness to the creation of the universe by the one true God, amid the polytheistic inventions of a later day [Gen. ii. 3]. Cain and Abel made offerings to God of the first-fruits of their land and cattle [Gen. iv. 3, 4]. Public worship is a recognised institution [Gen. iv. 26]. Noah distinguishes between clean and unclean animals [Gen. vii. 2], and makes an offering of the former to the Lord [Gen. viii. 20]. As we pass from the antediluvian to the patriarchal era the references to a ceremonial worship become more numerous and distinct. The rite of circumcision is ordained and becomes binding on every male [Gen. xvii. 10,11]: a formal mode of benediction obtains, accompanied by laying on of hands [Gen. xviii. 1-4, xlviii. 9-20], the sacred character of burial is recognised [Gen. xxiii. 19]; bowing the head is the expression of a devout worship [Gen. xxiv. 26, 48]: altars are built, and a ceremonial washing and change of dress is observed [Gen. xxxv. 2-7]. The dedication of a pillar is effected by pouring on oil [Gen. xxviii. 18]: vows are solemnly taken before God [Gen. xxviii. 20]; and if the Book of Job is to be referred to this early date, sacrifices and burnt-offerings appear to have been presented continually [Job i. 5]. The patriarchal regime [B.C. 1996-1491] gives place in time to the Mosaic dispensation, where, instead of scanty allusions in isolated texts, we find a complete system of most elaborate ritual provided for the Jewish nation by God Himself. It was, moreover, presented to them under circumstances of the greatest awe and solemnity. God vouchsafed a personal interview to Moses for the purpose. His appearance was terrible [Exod. xxiv. 10]: the interview lasted forty days and forty nights [Exod. xxiv. 18]; and though the reader must be referred to other sources for a detailed description of the ceremonial code, yet it may be here remarked that the smallest details received a Divine imprimatur; details as to ordinary offerings [Lev. i.-vi.], extraordinary sacrifices [Lev. viii.-xvi.], holiness of persons generally, of priests in particular, of places, of things, of persons, of days [Lev. passim]. Two men, Bezaleel and Aholiab, are specially endowed with divine wisdom in workmanship to execute the sacred work, and to fashion the tabernacle with its vessels and ornaments according to the revealed design [Exod. xxxi. 1-6]; and the various institutions are closed with a promise on God's part to be continually with His people and to defend them, while His will is in all respects carefully carried out [Exod. xxix. 42-46]. Nor was this direct bestowal of a divine superintendence confined to this particular era of Old Testament history. At the time when the Temple was to be built [B.C. 1015], David adds in his parting charge to his son and successor, after an elaborate description of the pattern of the proposed house and of its fittings, "All this the Lord made me understand in writing by His hand upon me, even all the works of this pattern" [1 Chron. xxviii. 11-19]; and during the actual progress of the work it is said, "Now these are the things wherein Solomon was instructed for the building of the house of God" [2 Chron. iii. 3]. While at its completion God's approbation is conveyed thus: "I have heard thy prayer and thy supplication that thou hast made before Me, I have hallowed this house which thou hast built to put My Name there for ever, and Mine eyes and Mine heart shall be there perpetually" [1 Kings ix. 3]. Yet the object of all this care was not a perpetual institution, but a transitory preparation for the world-embracing dispensation of Christianity, which God in the fulness of time intended to unfold. This fugitive character of the Jewish ritual was evident from the typical character of its ceremonial, and especially of its sacrifices and its priesthood. Such was seen to be the case by the Psalmist and prophets, whose allusions are frequent to the impossibility of their being acceptable in themselves [Psa. xl. 8, 9], and to the time coming when not among the Jews only, but throughout the whole world, incense and a pure offering should be presented to the Lord [Mal. i. 11]. The law was the schoolmaster to educate the world for Christ [Gal. iii. 24]; and Christ being its end and object [Rom. x. 4], it was to disappear when He became incarnate.

But here the question arises whether at the Christian era all ritual and symbolism were intended to be for ever swept away, and a purely spiritual worship substituted in their place, or whether another and a higher ritual was to supersede the Jewish, full of a deeper significance and possessed of a more real value, because it was no longer the shadow of good things to come [Heb. x. 1], but the pledge and witness of their having arrived. The latter position will be supported by reference [1] to Holy Scripture itself and [2] to primitive Christianity.

Testimony of Holy Scripture. Apart from all à priori considerations, and apart from the absence of any passage which "totidem verbis" abrogates the future use of ceremonial observances, the following texts seem to convey positive evidence to the contrary. During the forty days which intervened between the Resurrection and Ascension our Lord had constant intercourse with His Apostles, and spoke to them of things pertaining to the kingdom of God [Acts i. 3], revealing to them, it may be inferred, details of the Church's future polity and worship, which had been unnecessary while He was still with them in the flesh. Very shortly afterward the first converts are depicted as continuing steadfastly together in the Apostles' doctrine (τῇ διδάχῃ) and fellowship (τῇ κοινωνίᾳ), and in the breaking of bread (τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου) and in prayer (ταῖς προσευχαῖς), all which expressions imply a settled discipline and mode of worship. The Epistles throughout, though they do not originate, imply the previous existence of a similar state of things. Let all things be done decently and in order [1 Cor. xiv. 40] is St. Paul's general maxim to the Church of Corinth. Its members are praised for keeping the various ordinances already delivered to them [1 Cor. xi. 2]. The weekly offertory is especially recommended to their attention [1 Cor. xvi. 2]. Timothy is exhorted to see that supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks (εὐχαριστίας) be made for all men [1 Tim. ii. 1]. Regimen and polity as well as doctrine are matters of perpetual spiritual import, and in both apostolic precedent is to be strictly adhered to; and if the early Christians wished to find a pattern on which to model their services they would turn to the account of worship as it exists in heaven, and as it was revealed to the last of the Apostles. There, in the midst of the throne, as the object of adoration, stood a Lamb as it had been slain; before it kneel the four mysterious beings and the four and twenty elders, who have harps and golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of the saints [Rev. v. 8]. In an attitude of prostration, they sing the new song, "Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth" [Rev. v. 9, 10]. Around these, though at a greater distance, is a larger company of worshippers: "And I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts, and the elders, and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands; saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing" [Rev. v. 11, 12]. Moreover, the elders are clothed with white raiment, having crowns of gold on their heads; and there were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, suspended over a sea of glass like unto crystal [Rev. iv. 4, 5]. The meaning of many passages in the Revelation may be doubtful, but there never could be any mistake as who was meant by the Lamb, or what was the character of the adoration offered to Him; and the chief act of worship on earth, the Holy Eucharist, was made as closely as possible to resemble this adoration of the Lamb in Heaven.

Admitting, then, the existence of a divinely authorized form of Christian worship, we can detect in the three phases of ritual as they were successively developed—the patriarchal, the Mosaic, and the Christian—a threefold purpose and unfolding of God's truth. The first was to testify of the existence of God as the one supreme Creator of the universe: the second to reveal Him still further, not only as the Creator but also as the Lawgiver of His people, "I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices: but this thing commanded I them, saying, Obey My voice, and I will be your God, and ye shall be My people; and walk ye in all the ways that I have commanded you, that it may be well with you" [Jer. vii. 22, 23]. The third was to bear witness to a further development of God's providence in the sacrifice and mediation of Jesus Christ; for one of its main objects was to be a perpetual witness of His death till He should come again [1 Cor. xi. 26]. The practical object of these changes was on a corresponding scale of development. The patriarchal ritual, where the priestly and sacrificial duties were performed by the head of the clan or family, was a bond of social union. The Jewish ritual, with the Levitical priesthood and extended and formularized ceremonial, was a bond of national union. The Christian ritual, superseding all that betokened a merely national relationship, became a symbol of universal brotherhood.

Original simplicity of ritual. The objectors to ritual are wont to draw an invidious comparison between the gorgeousness of the later and the simplicity of the earlier Christian ritual. Mosheim [A.D. 1694-1755] remarks, that Christ only ordained two ceremonies, Baptism and Holy Communion. This is true, as far as explicit statements in the Gospels are concerned; but it may be fairly asked in return, Had the Apostles no divine authority for accompanying the gift of the Holy Ghost in Confirmation with the outward form of laying on of hands? [Acts viii. 17.] Was St. Paul unauthorized in associating a similar formality with the admission into holy orders? [1 Tim. v. 22] or St. James when he directed the sick to call for the elders of the Church to anoint him with oil? [James v. 14.]

There is, however, a passage referring to the Holy Communion in St. Gregory's writings [A.D. 590-604], which has been much insisted on. "We therefore repeat the Lord's Prayer soon afterwards, because it was the custom of the Apostles to consecrate the host at that prayer only; and it seemed to me very inconvenient to repeat over the oblation a prayer which a scholastic had composed, and to omit the traditional words of which our Lord Himself had been the author." But Cardinal Bona [tom. i. p. 75], Le Brun [tom. ii. p. 82], and Maskell [Preface to Ancient Liturgy of Church of England, p. xx.], agree in interpreting the words to mean, that the Holy Eucharist was never celebrated without the Lord's Prayer, and not that the Lord's Prayer was the only one used in Apostolic times. In fact, the latter view would be quite inconsistent with the glimpses which we obtain of Christian worship in the earliest times; as for example in the often-quoted passage of Justin Martyr. [Liturgy.]

Later on we find allusions to distinctive vestments for the clergy to wear during the performance of divine service. The Emperor Constantine gave a gold embroidered vestment to Macarius, Bishop of Jerusalem [c. A.D. 330], for the administration of baptism. Other robes are mentioned by Athanasius[1] [A.D. 325-373], by Chrysostom, Bishop of Constantinople[2] [A.D. 397-403], and from the Council of Laodicea [can. 22 and 23, A.D. 361] they appear to have acquired sufficient importance to become the subject of conciliar enactments. From these and similar facts we are inclined to accept the suggestion of Renaudot, "Christ's words to His Apostles, 'Do this in remembrance of Me,' contain the precept for celebrating the Eucharist according to the commandment of Christ, but they do not express the form in which it should be celebrated. But no Christian doubts that the Apostles were instructed on this point by our Lord, as well as in all other points which pertained to the constitution of the Christian religion" [Renaudot, Dissert. p. 2]; and the conclusions of a German ritualist, "On mature reflection, I am satisfied that the Apostles by no means performed the divine liturgy with such brevity, at least as a general rule, as some have confidently asserted. The faithful, whether converts from among the Jews or Gentiles, were accustomed to ceremonies and prayers in their sacrifices; and can we suppose that the Apostles would neglect to employ the like, tending so greatly, as these must do, to the dignity of the service, and to promote the reverence and fervour of the worshipper" [Krazer, de Liturgiis, i. 1-3].

Modern ingenuity has, however, suggested several more possible origins for ritual. Mosheim says that it was introduced, partly [1] to rebut the charge of atheism which was brought by the heathen against persons who exhibited none of the external paraphernalia of religion; [2] that it may have been to conciliate the Jews, who, having been accustomed to an elaborate ceremonial, would be more likely to be won over to a religion which presented a similar external appearance: hence the adoption into the Christian vocabulary of such words as priest, sacrifice, altar, &c.; [3] that in the third century Platonic and Pythagorean theories became incorporated into Christianity, and that the new ideas thence derived on the subject of spirits and demons were the cause of the different exorcisms and benedictions, and of the mortifications, and penances and excommunications; and that finally in the fourth century these rites had so multiplied that even St. Augustine complained of them [Epist. 55, ad Januar.], although it is evident that St. Augustine's complaint was levelled at the unauthorized introduction of observances by individuals or congregations, not at any which had received the full sanction of the councils or the usages of the Universal Church. But allowing a greater simplicity to have existed in the first few centuries, there are two causes which now exist no longer, but which amply explain such a fact. [1.] The non-committal of the early liturgies to writing, and the consequent absence of any ceremonial "directorium." In the early persecutions copies of the Scriptures were frequently given up to the heathen, for fear of torture or death, but no mention is made of any liturgical books. St. Basil, Bishop of Cæsarea [A.D. 370-379], asks "Whence do we draw the custom of blessing the water at baptism, and the oil for the chrism, and, moreover, the candidate himself? from what writings? is it not from a silent and mystic tradition?" [De Spiritu Sancto, c. 27], and the fact that the earliest known liturgies of Asia Minor, Africa, Italy, and Gaul, retain so many common elements of ritual, although they were not committed to writing for several centuries, is a strong circumstantial proof of their descent from a common Apostolic origin and authority. [2.] The fear of persecution. For many years it was a perilous thing to be detected in public worship. Christians met at early hours and in caves, where an ornate ritual was, by the circumstances of the case, impossible; but after the conversion of Constantine [A.D. 324] it assumed its natural beauty and proportions. One further theory to account for the origin of ritual was invented in the earlier part of the fourth century. The Manichæans, who themselves denounced all symbolism, and disregarded the Christian festivals, taunted the orthodox with borrowing their rites from Paganism; a view which is met by St. Augustine, who had himself been a "hearer" of the sect for nine years, in his epistle Contra Faustum, xxxii. 6, &c.

[1] Athan. Apol. ii. p. 778.
[2] Chrys. Hom. lxxxii. in Matt. p. 705.

Modes of Celebrating Divine Service. All divine service may be regarded in the light of a sacrifice offered by man to God, in a more general sense than that which the word bears when it is employed to describe the service at the altar. Its use is derived from the carnal sacrifices of bulls and goats under the Jewish system, the symbolical application of which to the offering of prayer and praise was not unfamiliar to the Psalmist: "Let my prayer be set forth in Thy sight as the incense, and let the lifting up of my hands be an evening sacrifice" [Psa. cxli. 2]. Commenting on this Psalm, St. Hilary says, "The sacrifice of Christians is their prayers, for we upon whom the ends of the world are come do not sacrifice to God with blood or burnt-offerings" [Hilar. in Psa. cxli. p. 330], and Eusebius [A.D. 265-338] calls the prayers of Christians "rational and unbloody sacrifices to God" [De Laud. Constant. Orat. p. 659]. Bearing this in mind, we shall be able to determine the real position of the officiating minister. Except when he is addressing the congregation from the pulpit, or catechizing or instructing the young, he is either [1] the temporal deputy of His Divine Master, or [2] the minister offering in the name and on behalf of the people. In the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, he stands primarily as the earthly representative of the great High Priest, who is the real Consecrator, but also as the spokesman of the assembled people who have met "as a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ" [1 Pet. ii. 5]. On the other hand, in the recitation of the daily ervices and the conduct of the minor offices of intercession or praise, he is primarily the deputy on behalf of the people, acting as the patriarch Job, who, while his sons were feasting, rose up early in the morning and offered burnt-offerings according to the number of them all; "for Job said it may be my sons have sinned and cursed God in their hearts. Thus did Job continually" [Job. i. 5]. Those present join in the minister's offering, expressing their assent either by secret concurrence with the petitions which the priest offers in a loud voice for himself and for them all, or by openly joining him, and uniting their voices with his in an audible tone.

Choral Service. This public service has, from the earliest times, assumed a musical character. Music is not only a natural way of expressing the human feelings of joy, or hope, or fear, but there is also an appropriateness in associating a fixed method of expression with our addresses to Almighty God, and the voices of large congregations are most powerful and united when pitched in a certain key. We find, accordingly, that music has always assumed a prominent place in the ritual arrangements of divine worship. This was especially the case with the Jews. When David brought up the ark of God out of the house of Abinadab, "he and all Israel played before God with all their might, and with singing, and with harps, and with psalteries, and with timbrels, and with cymbals, and with trumpets" [1 Chron. xiii. 8]; and when the ark reached its final resting-place in Jerusalem, men were especially appointed from among the Levites for the office of singers, who were to enjoy the privilege of remaining in the chambers free, for they were employed in that work day and night [1 Chron. ix. 33]. Subsequently this choir is enumerated by name, and divided into classes, as skilled in instrumental music, in cymbals, psalteries, and harps, or in vocal music, in which Chenaniah, the chief of the Levites, had the office of precentor [1 Chron. xv. 16-22]; and this arrangement became permanent after Solomon had completed his temple. He is said to have set singers also before the Lord, that by their voices they might make sweet melody, and daily sing praises in their song [Ecclus. xlvii. 9]; and the solemnity of the dedication was increased when these singers, "all of them of Asaph, of Heman, and Jeduthun, with their sons and their brethren, being arrayed in white linen, having cymbals, and psalteries, and harps, stood at the east end of the altar, and with them an hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets; and it came to pass as the trumpeters and singers were as one, to make one sound to be heard in praising and thanking the Lord, and when they lifted up their voice with the trumpets, and cymbals, and instruments of music, and praised the Lord saying, For He is good; for His mercy endureth for ever: that then the house was filled with a cloud, even the house of the Lord; so that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud: for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of God" [2 Chron. v. 12-14]. Now, there is no express abolition of this choral element of divine worship in the New Testament, nor are there any words which might be interpreted to mean that for the future it would be either a less important feature or less acceptable to God. On the contrary, immediately after the first institution of the Holy Eucharist, our Lord and His Apostles sang a hymn before they went out into the Mount of Olives [Matt. xxvi. 30]. Twice St. Paul bids those whom he addresses to speak in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in their heart to the Lord [Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16]; and in the Book of Revelation the worship of the redeemed is represented as choral, for "they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four beasts, and the elders: and no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty and four thousand, which were redeemed from the earth" [Rev. xiv. 3]. The glimpses which we obtain of Christian history in primitive times fully bear out this view. Pliny the younger, Governor of Bithynia [A.D. 104], writing to the Emperor Trajan for instructions how to deal with the Christians in his province, thus incidentally describes their habits, "They meet together before dawn on certain days, and sing a hymn to Christ God" [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iii. 32]. Justin Martyr [A.D. 150] describes the Christian service as consisting of solemn rites and hymns [Apol. i. 13]. Lucian [A.D. 120-200] in one of his Dialogues, describing his visit to one of the religious assemblies of Christians, says, that he heard there a prayer which began with the Father, and which ended with a hymn of many names [πολυώνυμον ὠδην, Luc. Philopatris, p. 1128]. Later on hymn singing became much more in vogue. St. Chrysostom [A.D. 397-403] relied on it as his chief weapon for counteracting the Arian heresy; incorporating and popularizing orthodox doctrines in hymns for general use. By this time, too, ecclesiastical music had been systematically arranged by St. Ambrose, Bishop of Milan [A.D. 374], and "Cantus Ambrosianus" became a synonym for church song, until it gave way to the elaborate notation which still bears the name of its celebrated author, St. Gregory [A.D. 590-604]. A technical account of the Ambrosian and Gregorian schools of music will not be attempted here,[1] but among the several ritual alterations to which they gave rise, the following are worthy of notice:—

The introduction of choral assistants to the people, in the form of a distinct body of singers. At the present day "psalmistæ" are reckoned among the five minor orders of the Church of Rome, but the first reference to them as a separate class from the congregation dates from the Council of Laodicea [A.D. 361]. They are also mentioned in the Apostolical Constitutions [iii. 2] and in the Apostolical Canons [can. 69], which are probably compilations of rules and practices established in various churches and at different times, down to the close of the fifth century; also by St. Jerome [de Septem ordin. Eccles. tom. iv. p. 81] and by many subsequent writers. Their duty consisted in leading and assisting the devotions of the people; the only evidence to the contrary is the fifteenth canon of the Council of Laodicea, which forbids any others to sing in the church except only the canonical singers, a regulation which is generally interpreted as a temporary provision to remedy a defective style of singing [Bingham, Antiq. bk. iii. cap. 7]. They were formally admitted into their office, without any imposition of hands, by the parish priest, with these words, "See that thou believe in thy heart what thou sayest with thy mouth, and approve in thy works what thou believest in thy heart."[2]

The introduction of responsive services and a double choir. The custom of singing both psalms and hymns in alternate verses, "antiphono cantu," and the division of the choir into two parts for that purpose, may have been originally introduced for the sake of resting the voice, or more probably of producing a better musical effect. St. Ambrose [A.D. 374-397] seems to view the arrangement in the latter light, when he says, "From the responsories of the psalms, and the singing of men, women, virgins, and children, there results an harmonious noise like the waves of the sea" [Hexæm. lib. iii. cap. 5]. It was a custom of purely Eastern origin, where it has been traced back by some authors as far as Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch [A.D. 115]: and though this is extremely uncertain, the following passage from Socrates, an ecclesiastical historian of the earlier part of the fifth century, is sufficiently beautiful to be worth quotation: "Now let us record when the hymns that are sung interchangeably in the church, commonly called anthems, had their origin. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch in Syria, the third bishop in succession from Peter the Apostle, who was conversant, and had great familiarity, with the Apostles, saw a vision of angels, who extolled the blessed Trinity with hymns that were sung interchangeably, and delivered unto the church of Antioch the order and manner of singing expressed in the vision Thereupon it came to pass that every church received the same tradition" [Socr. Hist. Eccl. vi. 8]. Another account [Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. ii. 24] says that Flavian and Diodorus first brought in the way of singing David's psalms alternately into the church of Antioch in the reign of Constantius [A.D. 306-337]; but whether this was its first introduction or merely a revival of an earlier practice, it thenceforward spread so rapidly that St. Basil [A.D. 329-379] alludes to it as, in his time, the received custom of all the East [Ep. 63, ad Neocæsar.]. Towards the close of the fourth century it was introduced into the cathedral at Milan by St. Ambrose, and thence into the Western Church generally. The orthodox were suffering at that time from the persecution of the Arian Empress Justina, and the services of the faithful among the Milanese had to be held secretly by night, St. Augustine expressly relating how he heard antiphonal chanting, under those circumstances, for the first time [August. Confess. lib. ix. cap. 7]. Then, as singing became more elaborate, we find special service books compiled for the use of choirs, such as the "responsoriale," the "antiphonarium," and the "graduale," which contained those portions of the services to which they respectively appertained, and to be sung antiphonally. "Psalmi responsorii" are also mentioned [Greg. Turon. de Vitis Patrum, cap. 8], which some suppose to be so called because they answer to the lessons after which they were immediately sung, but others because they were sung in alternate verses by the choir, one half answering the other. Some too have supposed the same meaning to underlie our modern word "anthem," regarding it not as an altered form of antiphon (ἀντιφωνη), but of "antihymnus" (ἄνθυμνος), a responsive hymn.

Variations of ancient days. As saints' days and festivals multiplied they began to be celebrated with different degrees of solemnity. Some were called "doubles," others "semi-doubles." Festivals which were neither doubles nor semi-doubles were called simples. Week-days on which no festival occurs were called "feriæ." Of doubles, which were so called because the antiphon is repeated entire both before and after the psalms of the day, some are of the first class, others of the second class, some are greater doubles, others common doubles.

[1] This will be found in the Ritual Introduction to Blunt's Annotated Prayer Book, part ii.

[2] The tenth canon of the fourth Council of Carthage [A.D. 399] runs thus: "Psalmista, id est, cantor potest, absque scientia episcopi, sola jussione presbyteri officium suscipere cantandi, dicente sibi presbytero; vide ut quod ore cantas corde credas, et quod corde credis operibus comprobes."

Semi-doubles were so called because only part of the antiphon is said before each psalm. Very intricate rules exist for the precedence and coincidence of festivals, of the different degrees for which the reader is referred to the directions which will be found in the preface of the Roman Missal, and in the different service books of the Mediæval Church.

As early as A.D. 492, Gelasius had arranged prayers, collects, and prefaces, in a Sacramentary which bears his name; and as services and ceremonial usages continued to multiply, the following separate service books were compiled: the Missal, or office for the mass; the Breviary, comprising the daily offices and canonical hours of the Church; the Rituale, or Manuale, containing the minor sacramental and other offices; the Pontificale, containing the various ceremonies and consecrations which can only be episcopally performed.

Besides these the following smaller service books were also in use: Legenda, a book containing the lessons to be read at morning service; Antiphonarium, a book containing invitatories, responsories, verses, collects, &c., to be said or sung by priest and people alternately; Graduale, a book containing the offices for sprinkling holy water, the gradalia and symbols to be sung at the offertory and the mass; Psalterium, the book of psalms; Troparium, book of sequences; Ordinale, a book of rules and orders to direct the right manner of saying and performing the service; Processionale, containing the ordering of processions; Hymnarium, comprising the hymns in verse which from the time of St. Ambrose were chanted in the canonical hours; Collectarium, containing the collects and the capitula or short lessons recited in the offices; Homilarium, Passionarium, Martyrologium, containing a homily on the gospel for the day, and an account of the martyrdom of the saints for each distinct festival. In the eleventh century the Breviary was compiled out of these various service books, the lessons, anthems, responsories, and hymns being collected into one volume. For the sake of convenience it was afterwards published in two or four volumes corresponding to the seasons of the year, and its Anglican form acquired the name of Portiforium.

We now pass on to the different kinds of masses, with their titles and leading features. They were Missa solemnis or Missa alta;—high mass, in which the celebrant was attended by deacon, subdeacon and acolytes, and full ritual was carried out with lights, music, and incense. Missa publica or communis;—so called in contradistinction to private masses held in monasteries or retreats. Missa privata, bassa, or plana;—low mass in which, as opposed to high mass, the priest was accompanied by one attendant, and at which, as opposed to missa publica, only the celebrating priest communicated. Missa solitaria;—when the priest performed the Divine service and consecrated not only privately, but without any attendant minister. Missa votiva;—votive masses for special objects public and private. Missa Præsanctificatorum;—a mass allowed in the Greek Church during Lent, but limited in the Latin Church to Good Friday, in which the prayer of consecration was omitted, and the priest communicated from the elements which had been consecrated on the previous day. [Missa Præsanctificatorum.] Missa sicca;—a repetition of the communion service without consecration and without communion. This form of service was mainly for use at sea, and thence acquired the name of Missa nautica. It must not be confounded with our occasional ante-communion office, which stops short at the close of the prayer for the Church militant before the anaphora commences. [Missa Sicca.]

Processions also formed a very prominent feature in the ritual of the Mediæval Church. Their institution is commonly attributed to Mamercus, Bishop of Lyons [A.D. 450-470], but St. Basil's allusion to them [Ep. 63, Ad Neocæsar. p. 97] affords some ground for believing that they were known in the East at least a century earlier. [Litany. Rogations.] The object of such processions was sometimes thanksgiving, sometimes to avert some general calamity, sometimes to supplicate the Divine blessing for the fruits of the earth. They were always conducted with great pomp and solemnity; with silver crosses [Palladius, Vita Chrysos. c. 15, p. 27], banners, incense, and in later days with exposed relics and the reserved host [Walsingham, Hist. Ang. p. 339]. The rules for their arrangement were contained in a service book called the Processionale, which comprised complete directions for the processions, either on ordinary or extraordinary occasions, whether in the Church or from one part of a building to another, or out of doors in the fields. The following statute of the collegiate church of St. Mary Ottery, Devon, bears quaint testimony to the great importance which was attached to the orderly performance of such processions:—"Also we order that each canon in residence and each vicar shall have a processionale for himself, lest in walking and singing they should come into collision or disorderly cross each other's path, and let these processionalia remain in their possession and their successors' for ever" [Oliver's Monast. Exon. p. 270]. In some churches marks were made in the stone or tile floor to indicate the position of each official person while the procession was being arranged.

In our modern English usage both the musical and ritual modifications of mediæval customs are very great, but the principles of Catholic worship though modified still remain. The service is still intended to be musically conducted throughout: the rubrical term "saying" being an ecclesiastical or technical expression for utterance in a plain tune and distinct voice without those elaborate inflexions and intonations which are generally understood by "singing;" while "reading" is a general term including both those methods. In our cathedrals, which are theoretically the model for parish services generally, the old principles of choral worship, of choral assistants to the people, and of the double division of the choir into "Decani" and "Cantoris" are fully carried out; and this same intention of securing the musical efficiency of the service is shewn by the ninety-first Canon [A.D. 1603], which says that the parish clerk shall not only be "of honest conversation, and sufficient for his reading and writing, but also for his competent skill in singing if it may be."

Variety of uses in the early Church. At the era of the Reformation some simplification of existing rituals had become most desirable, and the Book of Common Prayer was compiled as the general service book of the National Church of England, in lieu of the various and constantly diverging uses of different provinces or dioceses. No doubt variety was in many respects preferable to a hard line of uniformity, but the principle had been carried too far. Originally each bishop had the power to form his own liturgy, and to regulate its attendant ritual, provided that the essential features of Christian worship were retained, and that nothing commanded in Scripture or derived from Apostolic times was omitted. Instances of this are numerous. St. Basil [A.D. 329-379] composed a liturgy for the Church of Cæsarea, which received the sanction of its bishop, Eusebius [Greg. Naz. Orat. 20]. Maiuma, a village in Palestine and in the diocese of Gaza, was erected into a separate see [c. A.D. 350], and as soon as this event took place, it was no longer bound to use the same liturgy and ritual as the episcopal city with which it was previously connected [Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. v. 3]. By degrees, however, the liberty enjoyed by separate dioceses was curtailed, and the different bishops in a province became compelled to conform to the liturgy of their metropolitan. Many provincial councils contain canons to this effect: the earliest extant being the fifteenth canon of the Council of Vannes in Brittany [A.D. 465], which ordered "that one and the same custom in celebrating Divine service, and the same order of psalmody, should be kept in all churches in the province of Tours; that as they held one faith and confession of the Holy Trinity, so they should keep to one rule of Divine offices, lest if they varied in their observations, that variation should be interpreted as a disagreement in some point or other." In the Council of Agde [A.D. 506] the thirtieth canon was as follows: "That one and the same order should be equally observed in all churches of the province in all parts of divine service." Eleven years later the Council of Epone passed a resolution [can. xxvii.] that in celebrating divine offices the provincial bishop should observe the same order as was used by his metropolitan. In the same year the Council of Girona made a similar rule for the Spanish province of Tarragona, which lasted till A.D. 633, when the fourth Council of Toledo extended the order for uniformity from the separate provinces to the whole of Spain [can. ii.]. Thus for the first three centuries each separate diocese had the right of appointing its own service and ritual. In the fifth century the area of uniformity was extended, and the liturgy and customs of the metropolitical church became the standard for the whole province; and in the seventh century, when separate kingdoms became enrolled in the Western Church, the provincial uses gave way to national liturgies whose area was co-extensive with the boundaries of their respective territories. This right of each national church to frame its own liturgy was expressly recognised by Pope Gregory I. St. Augustine had landed in England [A.D. 596], bringing with him, no doubt, the Roman liturgy, but he found traces of another liturgy, probably of Gallican origin, already in use. A few years later, among other questions which he submitted to the Pope's decision, was one as to the service which ought to be used in the English Church, the Roman and British liturgies not being the same. Gregory's answer was, that Augustine might himself select whichever he thought most suitable to the wants of the people, provided that nothing was introduced contrary to the teaching of the Catholic Church, and that regard was had to the circumstances and prejudices of the country and to the glory of God [Bede, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xxvii. 60]. The same liberal principle was maintained by St. Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury [A.D. 1093-1109]. In answer to some complaints which had been addressed to him about a want of uniformity in non-essentials, he wrote thus: "You complain because the sacraments are not celebrated everywhere in the same way, but in different manners in different places. It would be a good and desirable thing if they could be celebrated exactly in the same way throughout the universal Church. But since many differences exist which do not affect the substance or virtue of, or faith in, the sacraments, and since they cannot all be reduced to one prescribed form, I consider that they ought rather to be quietly acquiesced in than noisily condemned. We have received it as a tradition from the holy Fathers, that if the bond of love is retained in the Catholic faith, differences of custom do no harm; and if the question is raised as to what is the origin of such customs, I imagine it to be nothing else than the diversities of human minds."[1] The same principle is affirmed in the thirty-fourth Article of Religion, "It is not necessary that traditions and ceremonies be in all places one, and utterly alike, for at all times they have been divers and may be changed according to the diversities of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's Word. . . . Every particular or national church hath authority to ordain, change, and abolish ceremonies or rites of the church ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying." It was on this principle that Antioch, Constantinople, Alexandria, Rome, Gaul, Spain, &c., "in earlier days each possessed their separate liturgies, and that the English Church in the sixteenth century claimed the right to put forward the Prayer Book as a common liturgy and compendium of divine offices for use throughout the English branch of the Catholic Church. Up to A.D. 1549 great variety existed. The primitive right of each diocese to possess its own liturgy and ritual was still exercised, and had a tendency to increase rather than to diminish: hence the Uses of Lincoln, Salisbury, Hereford, Bangor, and York, which are mentioned in the Preface to the Book of Common Prayer. References are also found to other uses which are now known only by name. Such was the Use of St. Paul's[1] (missa secundum usum ecclesiæ Sancti Pauli Londiniarum). An Exeter Use is also mentioned in the statutes drawn up by Bishop Grandisson for the collegiate Church of Ottery St. Mary. Two earlier, but unsuccessful, attempts had been made to introduce a uniformity of worship through England. The Council of Cloveshoe [A.D. 747] recommended the adoption of the Roman liturgy to all the English dioceses, but its recommendation was never more than partially carried out; and in A.D. 1085, the Sarum Breviary and Missal were compiled by St. Osmund, Bishop of Salisbury, and obtained a very wide circulation beyond the immediate diocese of Sarum, but were never universally accepted to the exclusion of previously existing uses.

[1] Anselm, Opera, Ad Waleranni querelas responsio, p. 130.

It was, in a great measure, to remedy the inconveniences resulting from this variety that the First Book of Common Prayer, compiled by a Committee of Convocation (first appointed A.D. 1542), was issued in the second year of King Edward VI. [A.D. 1549]. This book, after receiving various additions and alterations in A.D. 1552, 1560, 1604, 1662, is still the guide of the English Church in all matters connected with the performance of divine service and ritual. Our present Prayer Book must not, however, be looked upon as a complete manual on this subject. We are expressly directed back in the opening rubric to the First Prayer Book of King Edward VI. for information on the accessories of ritual, and light is thrown on this and other points by reference [1] to the missals and service books of the pre-Reformation Church, [2] to the Inventories of A.D. 1552, [3] to the pre-Reformation Canons, which are declared by Act of Parliament [25 Hen. VIII. c. 19; 1 Eliz. c. 1] to be still binding, except in so far as they are [a] inconsistent with the royal prerogative, [b] contrary to the common law of the realm, [c] formally repealed by express statutes, or [d] incompatible with the provisions of the existing Prayer Book. These authorities are further illustrated by the Elizabethan Injunctions [A.D. 1559], the Advertisements of A.D. 1564, the Jacobean canons [A.D. 1603], and the Caroline canons of A.D. 1640. [Liturgies. Adoration.]

ROGATIONS. The three days before the Feast of our Lord's Ascension are called by this name, as being days of special supplication for God's mercy in preserving "to our use the kindly fruits of the earth," and in delivering us from the scourges of war, famine, and pestilence. The week is called in the Anglo-Saxon gangwuca, and the days gang dægas; the old form of the name, "gang days," still lingering in the north of England.

The institution of this time of abstinence and prayer is traced to Mamertus, or Mamereus, Bishop of Vienne, about the middle of the fifth century: many early writers concurring in the association of his name with them [Greg. Turon. Hist. ii. c. 34; Sidon. Apoll. i. c. 7, et alii, quoted by Martene, De Antiq. Eccl. Rit. iii. 515, ed. 1737]. They originated when the diocese of Vienne was in great distress and affliction from earthquake and fire and the inroads of wild beasts, on account of which the bishop caused the three days before Ascension to be observed with special solemnity, with prayer and fasting; litanies of supplication being said in procession. [Litany.] There seems, however, to have been some similar observance before this date in the churches of Gaul; and at all events the practice speedily became a fixed one, and extended to other countries, though it was not recognised at Rome until the pontificate of Leo III. [A.D. 800.] It is mentioned by the first Council of Orleans [A.D. 511]; and St. Cæsarius of Arles, in the same century, speaks of the Rogation-days as "holy and spiritual, full of healing virtue to our souls." Nevertheless, there was considerable opposition, though not to the Rogations themselves, yet to their observance during the fifty days between Easter and Pentecost—a time which was one continued festival in the early Church, and during which all fasting and kneeling at prayers were prohibited.[2] This is a rule which the Eastern Church observes to this day, and therefore keeps no such season as Rogation-tide, even the fasts of Wednesday and Friday being dropped during the fifty days. The Gotho-Hispanic Church solved the difficulty by ordering the Rogations to be kept on the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday after Pentecost, and also on the Kalends of November [Conc. Gerund. c. ii. iii.; Labbe, iv. p. 1568]. The fifth and sixth Councils of Toledo also appointed the Ides of December for a Rogation fast [Labbe, v. p. 1735].

The Sarum Missal contains collect, epistle, and gospel for these days, and both Bishop Cosin and the Commission of 1689 proposed the restoration of this feature to our own Prayer Book. Bishop Cosin also proposed the adoption of proper psalms.

The principal ceremony connected with the Rogation days was that of "Perambulations," or "Beating the bounds" of parishes, a practice which dates from very ancient times. It was usual to sing the Litany, or a portion of it, with the 103rd and 104th Psalms, in procession. Archbishop Winchelsea's Constitutions, which are enforced by 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, order the parish to provide, at its own charge, "vexilla pro rogationibus." The Injunctions of Queen Elizabeth [A.D. 1559] bid "the curate and the substantial men of the parish walk about the parishes as they are accustomed." The curate is to admonish the people at different stations, to give thanks to God, and the 103rd Psalm is to be said. There is a Homily in three parts for the days of Rogation week, and it appears from various bishops' articles of visitation that it was usual to have the Litany, with one portion of this homily, on each day. There is also, as a sequel to this homily, an "Exhortation to be spoken to such parishes where they use their perambulations in Rogation week, for the oversight of the bounds and limits of their town."

[1] Maskell's Liturgy of Church of England, preface, p. lxii.

[2] See Tertull. De Coron. Milit. c. iii.: "Die Dominico, jejunium nefas ducimus, vel de genicülis adorare. Eadem immunitate a die Paschæ in Pentecosten usque gaudemus." Also St. Epiphan. Exposit. Fid. n. xxii.: δίχα μόνης τῆς πεντηκοστῆς ὅλης τῶν πεντήκοντα ἡμερῶν, ἐν αἷς οὔτε γονυκλισίαι γίνονται οὔτε νηστεία προστέτακται.

ROMANISM. This word, by its formation, denotes the peculiarities, or what by those who use it are thought to be the peculiarities, in matters of faith, practice, and Church government, of the churches within the obedience of the See of Rome. Properly, therefore, Romanism is the deviation of the Latin Churches from the standard of Catholicity.

1. Inasmuch as there is no acknowledged declaration of the "Quod ubique," &c. other than the Nicene Creed, which is not sufficiently detailed for the present purpose, it would require a lengthened examination of all separate doctrines and practices to ascertain what Romanism, in this strict sense, really implies. Such an examination would be a full controversial treatise on theology. But it will be easily seen that by general use the word is referred (in a limited meaning) to the papal power and to those doctrines and practices by which that power is upheld. Thus the celibacy of the clergy and the system of indulgences are known to be supports of the Papal power, and so are considered to be parts of Romanism. But matters of a purely theological import are less and less included in the term. In this respect the way is at least preparing for a better understanding with the Romish Church. For example, the Tridentine doctrine of Justification is not thought to be so far from the truth, and the Lutheran doctrine so near the truth, as was thought not very many years ago. Again, the article which was made the crucial article at the Reformation, viz. Transubstantiation, is the very article in which an early agreement seems to be most probable. For, on the one hand, the materialistic interpretation current among the Schoolmen, and commonly accepted in the fifteenth century, is repudiated, the Council of Trent having authoritatively denied certain teaching which involved that interpretation [see Pusey, Eirenicon, p. 24]; so that the substance which the Church of England affirms to remain appears to be identical with the accidents which the Church of Rome affirms to remain: and, on the other hand, the Church of England is freeing itself from the Zuinglianism and Hoadlyism which had infected it, and is able to judge more calmly and fairly of the doctrine it had condemned. It appears consequently that the Greek, the Roman, the Anglican Churches are drawing nearer to each other in a common declaration of a transubstantiation not physical and carnal, but sacramental and mystical.[1]

It follows, then, that what was formerly the very test of Romish doctrine must now be eliminated from our conception of Romanism. And while theoretically it is true that Romanism is the deviation of the Romish Church from the standard of Catholicity, our conception of the character of that deviation is much altered; and we may practically narrow the definition to this that Romanism is the system of Church government which makes the Pope the one head and centre of Christendom, with those doctrines and practices which are erroneously maintained as subsidiary to that headship. Those adjuncts and buttresses of Popery have already been named under the title PAPACY.

The foregoing distinction between the purely dogmatic and the ecclesiastical systems of Rome was clearly drawn by Coleridge in 1830 [Church and State, p. 158]. He declared his full conviction, after a careful reading of the Summa Theologiæ of Aquinas, and a comparison of the system with the statements of Arnold and Bossuet, that the rites and doctrines, the agenda and credenda, of Roman Catholics, could we separate them from the adulterating ingredients combined with, and the use made of, them by the sacerdotal Mamelukes of the Romish monarchy for the support of the Papacy and papal hierarchy, would neither have brought about, nor have sufficed to justify, the convulsive separation under Leo X.

[2.] The Puritan or ultra-Protestant conception of Romanism, as formed in utter error and maintained in defiance of all history, needs but few words. Ultra-Protestantism assumes the Scriptures to be the sole rule of faith and practice, and each man's own judgment to be supreme in deciding what Scripture teaches. It calls the authority of the Church and the recognition of traditions Romanism. It assumes the Pope to be Antichrist, and calls every hierarchy Romanism. Everything that is above the Puritanic platform, although found in the Eastern Church and in the Primitive Church as well as the Western Church, is Romanism.

[3.] Again, Romanism may be used to describe the character of Latin Christianity as distinguished from Teutonic Christianity. Historians notice "that throughout the world, wherever the Teutonic is the groundwork of the language, the Reformation either is, or, as in Southern Germany, has been, dominant; wherever Latin, Latin Christianity has retained its ascendancy" [Milman, Hist. of L. Chr. introd. p. 10]. "Latin Christianity is distinguished by a firm adherence to legal form, the strong assertion of, and strict subordination to, authority." It has a stricter sacerdotalism, more direction to the conscience, and in its subjects more implicit obedience, greater trustfulness,[2] less

[1] That this persuasion is not confined to a few theologians thought to form a peculiar school, is made evident by the notice of the point in the Times' review of Blunt's History of the Reformation, February 27th and March 1st, 1869.

[2] This character of Romanism is observed in another aspect than a strictly religious aspect. One of the most eminent physicians in London told the writer that he found it easier to deal with a disease when the patient of private judgment, less of freedom, an inferior sense of personal responsibility, and (perhaps it must be added) a less keen sense of truth. In accordance, also, with the national character, there is in Latin Christianity a fuller ritual, a statelier ceremonial, greater warmth in the expression of devotion. In all this there is doubtless a general consonancy with the genius of the Latin-languaged races, as compared with the Teutonic, but a part at least is much less dependent on national character than is the remainder. And the stricter sacerdotalism of the Romish Church, maintained by a celibate clergy subject to a foreign spiritual head, would impress a distinct character on its faithful adherents, Teutons though they might be.

This system and character connects itself with the foregoing interpretations of Romanism, and it leads to the thought that, rejecting the fanatical abhorrence of "sacerdotalism" shewn by the ultra-Protestant, we must allow also that degree of sacerdotalism to be in excess which requires to be supported by means unwarranted by Scripture and by the early Church; that the degree of sacerdotalism designed by our Lord for His Church is that which is consistent with the independence of national churches and the social union of the priesthood with the laity. Believing this to be the true order of Christ's Church, and to exist in principle, however imperfectly realized, in national Episcopal churches of Teutonic Christianity, we shall be prepared to accept the verdict of the historian, that "this faith, with a less perfectly organized outward system, has exercised a more profound moral control, through the sense of strictly personal responsibility."

RULE OF FAITH. The rule of faith, κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας [Irenæus], Regula Fidei [Tertullian], is based upon, if not originally one with, the baptismal formula prescribed by the Saviour; "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world" [Matt. xxviii. 19, 20]. This baptismal form was the basis of a superstructure which was to comprise the substance of oral instruction communicated by the Lord to His Apostles, either during the days of His earthly ministry, or in that period of highest privilege, when, for forty days after the Resurrection, He carried on their instruction, "speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God." The earliest work of the Apostles would naturally be to embody these heads in a short form of words, that might serve as Christian instruction to new converts before their baptism, a "rule of faith;" καθολικὴ διδασκαλία;[1] as a traditional body of doctrine, κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας, "Prædicatio Apostolica;" ἐξήγησις ἀποστολικοῦ κηρύγματος,[2] to be filled out in due time by the inspired writings of the New Testament; and as a world-wide test of brotherhood, a "contesseratio" or countersign, whereby in all countries they who held the truth in sincerity might be known from heretical corrupters of the faith; "a mark whereby to discern Christian men from infidels and Jews" [Hooker, v. 42]. Possibly the Roman or Apostles' Creed, as being the simplest form, and indicating no particular heresy, may have been very nearly that which the Apostles gave to the Church; but each church had its own inherent authority to enlarge the definitions of the rule of faith in any direction that might be demanded in refutation of error. The addition of the term ὁμοούσιον τῷ Πατρὶ inserted by the Nicene Council, was only an example of the process that had been going on from the beginning, whereby the creeds of the East, the same in framework with those of the Western Churches, diverged at length so widely from the verbal arrangement of the latter. [Creeds.]

Hence this rule of faith is described in the earliest writings that mention it as a traditional body of doctrine, descending from the Apostles, and even from the Lord Himself. Thus Irenæus says [I. ii. Camb. ed.], "The Church, scattered though it be throughout the whole world to the very extremities thereof, hath received from the Apostles and their disciples faith in one God, τὴν πίστιν τὴν εἰς ἕνα Θεὸν, κ.τ.λ.;" and then follow the several terms of the Creed, but as "disjecta membra," the Church as yet being careful not to expose her sacred symbol in its integrity to the gaze and imitation of heresy. "The Church," he adds, "having received this body of doctrine, τοῦτο τὸ κήρυγμα, carefully guards it, as dwelling in one house; her faith is in accordance with it, and her preaching and instruction and tradition are in harmony with it, as though they were uttered with one mouth." This form, he says elsewhere [III. iv. 1], was committed to memory. "To which prescription those many barbarous nations assent who believe in Christ, having the saving doctrine, 'salutem,' written on their hearts by the Spirit, not on parchment with ink; and diligently guarding the ancient tradition, they believe 'in one God maker of heaven and earth,' &c.; the rudest nations being thereby preserved from the blasphemous ravings of heresy."[3] Similarly, Tertullian [Præscr. Hær. 12, 13, 14], "Let us inquire then in our own body, and of our own people, and from our own record, 'in nostro et a nostris et de nostro,' and only so far as any question may arise, without prejudice to the rule of faith, 'salva regula fidei.' Now this is the rule of faith wherein we express our belief that there was a Roman Catholic than when a Protestant; a statement which suggests much.

[1] Irenæus speaks of the "canon of truth which the believer hath received by baptism" [I. i. 20, Cambr. ed.]. Athanasius says "the sum and substance of our faith is contained in the words of Baptism." Augustine terms the baptismal formula "regula fidei" [Enchir. 15].

[2] It has been observed that the course of Justin Martyr's first Apology follows generally the order of the Apostles' Creed [Harvey, Hist. and Theol. of the Three Creeds, 40].

[3] It is disappointing that his close follower, Hippolytus, here diverges; and in speaking of the form of faith preserved by the Church, he exhibits it with a bearing on the teaching of philosophy, rather than as formularized by the Church [Phil. x. 32].

is one only God, and no other Creator of the world;" and he gives the several clauses of the Creed in their true order, though amplified by a brief running commentary, as they have a bearing on the heresies with which he is dealing. "This rule," he then says, "instituted, as will be shewn, by Christ, admits of no question amongst ourselves, except such as are forced upon us by heresy. . . . To know nothing in opposition to this rule is to know everything." Elsewhere [De Virg. Vel. i.] he says: "The rule of faith is altogether one, it alone is invariable and unalterable, 'immobilis et irreformabilis;' namely of faith in one God, Creator of the world," &c. And in his treatise against Praxeas [ii.], after running through the several clauses of the creed, he declares "that it descended from the beginning of the Gospel" [ab initio evangelii decucurrisse]. Origen in like manner, after opening the subject of his work, περὶ ἀρχῶν [i. 4], gives a running commentary on the articles of the creed, having judged it necessary to set out the "unwavering line and sure rule," certam lineam manifestamque regulam, (ἀπλανὴ στάθμην δῆλον τε κανόνα); . . . "let the preaching of the Church," he says, "delivered by the Apostles in orderly succession, and abiding in the Churches to the present day, be maintained, which in no point differs from the ecclesiastical and apostolical tradition. . . . Now these are the special points that have been clearly handed down by the Apostolical preaching;" and then, as in other instances, follows a gloss on the various articles of the Creed. Clement of Alexandria refers to no other than the Baptismal Rule of Faith when he says, "As it concerns the honourable to be false in nothing, and to retract no promise, however others may transgress their covenants, so it behoves us in no respect to transgress the ecclesiastical rule, κανόνα: we indeed observe it in everything, but heretics transgress that profession, ὁμολογίαν, which is undertaken with respect to the weightiest matters" [Strom. vii. 15].

The Council of Antioch in its synodical epistle to Paul of Samosata [A.D. 269] begins by stating that the bishops present first compared their creed, τὴν ἑαυτῶν πίστιν ἐδείξαμεν; and adds "it hath seemed good to us to set forth in writing the faith, ἔγγραφον τὴν πίστιν, which we have received from the beginning; and hold as delivered and preserved in the Holy Catholic Church to this day, transmitted from the blessed Apostles;" and then follows an exposition of the clauses of the Creed so far as they bore upon the heresy of Paul [Harvey's Eccl. Angl. Vindex Cath. i. 97]. The use of the creed as a baptismal profession of faith is exhibited in the Apostolical Constitutions [vii. 41]. The inference, therefore, to be drawn is clear and good, that the Rule of Faith has descended from the beginning; for where any early indication of it is given in ecclesiastical writings, it is invariably mentioned as a primeval tradition that had descended to the time of the several writers, unchanged in substance, from the Apostles. [Walch, Bibl. Symb. Vet. Bingham, Eccl. Ant. X. iii. iv. Harvey, Hist. and Theol. of Creeds.]

S

SABAOTH. The term Sabaoth is the plural of "sabá," a military host; it has nothing in common with Sabbath, which is derived from another root, "shabath," to rest. This is superfluous information to the Hebraist, but not so to the general reader, seeing that the two terms have been confounded by writers of highest authority, such as Spenser, Faëry Queen, viii. 2; Bacon, Adv. L. ii. 24; Johnson, Dict.; and Sir W. Scott, Ivanhoe, i. 11. [Smith, Dict. of Bible.] Lydus also [De Mensib. 38 and 98] derives the term from the Phœnician "sheba," seven, making it an appellative of the DEMIURGE, ὁ ὑπὲρ τοὺς ἑπτὰ πόλους, τοῦτ' ἐστιν ὁ Δημιουργός. [Herzog.] The term "Lord of Hosts" does not occur in the earlier books of the Bible until nearly the close of the purely theocratical regime, when Hannah first used it in her prayer for a son [1 Sam. i. 11]. At the same period the people were gathered yearly to sacrifice to the "Lord of Hosts" in Shiloh [1 Sam. i. 3], the place where the hosts of Israel in those primitive times had their camp [Josh. xviii. 9]. The term is used sparingly in the historical books until the Davidical time; but afterwards more frequently in Isaiah and the prophets, with the exception of Ezekiel and Daniel, who ignore it altogether. The term, though not used in the history of the struggle with the Canaanites, probably had its origin at Shiloh, and served the double purpose of designating the heavenly counterpart of Israel's military equipment, marshalled by the Lord against His enemies [see Josh. v. 14, xviii. 9; 1 Sam. xvii. 45; Isa. xxxi. 4; Psa. xxiv. 8, 10]; and of marking also the nothingness of the Zabian star-worship of the vanquished tribes [Job xxv. 5, xxxi. 26; Isa. xxiv. 23, xxvii. 1. ZABIANISM]. For from the earliest days the works of God in creation [Gen. ii. 1; Job xxxviii.], the elements, "fire and hail, snow and vapours, stormy wind fulfilling His word" [Psa. cxlviii. 8], and more especially the starry heavens [Isa. xl. 26] had been as the unnumbered host of the Creator, which the nations deified; and even the poets of Israel either personified them [Judg. v. 20; Job xxvi. 13], or made the shooting stars gleaming "arrows" or "glittering spears" of the Almighty [Hab. iii. 11].

The lawgiver of Israel, however, is careful to assert that their only function is to enlighten the firmament [Gen. i. 14-16] as the creatures of God [see Job ix. 9; Psa. viii. 3, xix. 1; Isa. xl. 26, xlv. 12; Jer. xxxi. 35; Amos v. 8], having no self-existent substantive being, as was the theory of Zabianism; but commencing with the morning of creation, and destined to come to an end again, when the purpose of their being shall have been accomplished. [Isa. xiii. 10, xxvii. 1, xxxiv. 4, lx. 19; Joel iii. 15; Matt. xxiv. 29; Rev. vi. 13.] The holy angels were the more glorious beings of that host, though still co-ordinate with the stars and heavenly elements, "Praise ye Him, all ye angels; praise ye Him, all ye hosts; praise ye Him, sun and moon; praise Him, all ye stars and light" [Psa. cxlviii. 2, 3]. The angelic powers at length came to be more generally designated as the heavenly host. "Bless the Lord, ye His angels that excel in strength, that do His commandments, hearkening unto the voice of His Word. Bless ye the Lord all ye His Hosts, ye ministers of His that do His pleasure" [Psa. ciii. 20, 21]. The 24th Psalm combines both senses in its opening and concluding verses. The heavenly host of angels, then, as the first-born of God's creatures, have pre-eminence above the rest [Psa. cxlviii. 2]. Man, made originally in the image of God, is made a little lower than the angels for the present, only to be crowned hereafter with glory and honour [Psa. viii. 5], when the unclouded majesty of that likeness shall be restored in him, and he shall "judge the angels" [1 Cor. vi. 3]. As ministering spirits, they for ever stand about the throne of the God of Hosts [Gen. xxviii. 12; Psa. lxxxix. 6-8; Rev. v. 11, vii. 11]. They are the executants of His righteous decrees [Gen. xxxii. 2; 2 Kings vi. 17; Psa. ciii. 20, 21; Zech. i. 8; Matt. xiii. 49]; and for this reason the witnesses of His final judgment [Joel iii. 11; Dan. ix. 10; Matt. xxv. 31; 2 Thess. i. 7]; as the body-guard of the King of kings [Deut. xxxiii. 2; Job i. 6; 1 Kings xxii. 19; Psa. lxviii. 17; Zech. xiv. 5; Rev. xix. 14]. Under the New Dispensation the ministry of the heavenly host is as conspicuously present [Matt. iv. 11; Luke xvi. 22, xxiv. 4; 1 Tim. iii. 16; Heb. i. 7, xii. 22; Psa. xci. 11] as it was when the Law was given on Mount Sinai [Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19].

The Targums retain the term without alteration; but the LXX. always more or less on their guard against anthropomorphism [SEPTUAGINT], and observing the relation that might be supposed to subsist between the κύριος στρατιῶν and the Hellenic Ἄρης βροτολοιγός, rendered the term as κύριος δυναμέων, Lord of (spiritual) powers; which is the more usual rendering in the Psalms. It may be noted that a large development of Hebrew angelology had taken place through contact with Oriental Magianism in Babylon; and the term δυναμέων was suggestive to Alexandrian ears of the array of angels thereby engrafted on the more chastened and primitive faith of Israel. Κύριος δυναμέων thus conveyed the idea of that infinite series of angelic beings of which we as yet know so little, but which later Judaism pretended to classify and define. A belief in their existence had descended as a tradition of Paradise, but the Jews of the exile debased them to a level with the Ferouers of Zerdusht. Παντοκράτωρ is another rendering, occurring in 2 Sam. and the minor prophets, in the sense of Lord of universal nature rather than of the angelic hierarchy. The other translators render the term literally as κύριος στρατιῶν. [Kirchen Lex., Himmelsheere. Herzog, Zebaoth.]

SABBATH, a day of rest. There has been much argument, whether or not the Sabbath was instituted immediately after the creation, and Gen. ii. 2, 3 be a record of the institution. Of more weight than all the arguments drawn from the book of Genesis is the fact that Ezekiel [c. xx.] deals with the Sabbath as dating from Moses; and that St. Paul reckons Sabbaths among the weak and beggarly elements of the law [Gal. iv. 10]; among the shadows of things to come, the body of which is Christ [Col. ii. 16]. St. Paul could hardly have spoken thus had the Sabbath been a primeval institution, intended to run through all times. At least these passages of Scripture shew that the theologian must deal with the Sabbath as a Jewish institution, no otherwise than he must deal with the rainbow as if it dated from Noah.

The Jews then had a cycle of Sabbaths, and occasional Sabbaths. The Sabbaths of the cycle were those of the seventh day [Exod. xvi. 22-30, xx. 8-11, xxiii. 12, xxxi. 12, xxxiv. 21, xxxv. 1-3; Numb. xv. 32-36; Deut. v. 12-15]; those of the seventh year [Exod. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 4]; those of the 7 × 7th year [Lev. xxv. 8-55].

Each seventh day there was an additional burnt-offering of two lambs [Numb. xxviii. 9], and the shewbread was changed [Lev. xxiv. 8]. It is generally said from Lev. xxiii. 3, that there was a holy convocation, a religious assembly. But let it be considered whether ver. 4, referring to the annual feasts, does not rule the interpretation of ver. 2, and shew that ver. 3 relates only to the annual feasts. It declares that the law of six days' work and one day's rest applies to these occasional Sabbaths, as e.g. in ver. 7, 8. On the other hand, whatever Philo's authority may be for Mosaic practice, we have it in favour of Moses having established religious assemblies. [See the passage from a lost work of Philo's in Euseb. Præpar. Evang., b. viii. c. 7, as quoted by Heylin, part i. p. 124.]

The Sabbatical year was a year of fallow for the land, of release to debtors [Deut. xv.]. In this year the law was read at the Feast of Tabernacles [Deut. xxxi. 10-13].

The year of jubilee (whether it was the forty-ninth or the fiftieth year is doubtful) was a year of fallow; in it all lands that had been alienated returned to the families of the original possessors; all Israelites who were in bondage were set free (the general law of release from bondage is in Exod. xxi. 2); "sanctified" lands might be redeemed at any time by a payment in proportion to the distance of the jubilee; but if they passed the jubilee unredeemed they became devoted for ever [Lev. xxvii.].

The occasional Sabbaths were those of the Annual Feasts. In Lev. xxiii. the Passover, the Feasts of Trumpets, of Expiation, and of Tabernacles have their Sabbaths, which are holy convocations. Of these religious meetings in early times, it does not appear that we possess any clear account. In later times they were presented in the synagogue worship.

This general outline will be sufficient for our present purpose, which is, not to give a history of the Sabbath, nor to enter minutely into the many questions regarding its observance, but to consider the theological bearings of the institution.

To estimate the institution of the Sabbath, we must consider what was the office of Israel as the chosen people. That office divides itself into two branches, [1] to receive, maintain, and spread the knowledge of the true God, to be a nation of witness among the nations of the earth; and [2] as the nation from which Christ was to spring to be a perpetual type of Him, and to prepare His way.

I. The worship of the One God, as opposed to idolatry, was the great point which Moses laboured to establish and maintain. And when Almighty God revealed Himself to Israel by His incommunicable Name, and made known the record of His six days' work, then He appointed the Sabbath as an express mark of allegiance. [See Exod. xxxi. 15-17.] Sabbath-breaking was a wilful rejection of God. Hence the punishment of death, and the vehement denunciations of the prophets. Accordingly in history idolatry and Sabbath-breaking went together; and when the Captivity had corrected the tendency to idolatry, there was no more Sabbath-breaking. Errors of superstitious observance came in, but there was no neglect.

The Sabbath is stated to be for a perpetual covenant. A covenant which God makes with man is a law with a promise annexed. The law is that of rest; the original promise that God will provide for the rest [Exod. xvi. 22-25]. For this under the Gospel see 2 Cor. viii. 14, 15.

For later promises, compare Isa. lvi. 4, 5 with Matt. xix. 12, and ver. 6, 7 with Acts x. 34, 35; and Isa. lviii. 13, 14 with Ps. xxxvii. 11 and Matt. v. 5.

II. The former branch of Israel's office referred to the Fourth Commandment as in Exodus, this to the command as in Deuteronomy. For in Deuteronomy the Sabbath is connected with the deliverance from Egypt, and this throws us upon the coming of Christ, "Out of Egypt have I called

My Son." "The word of promise was manifested and revealed, first, by immediate revelation and inspiration; after by figures, which were of two natures: the one, the rites and ceremonies of the law; the other, the continual history of the old world, and Church of the Jews; which, though it be literally true, yet is it pregnant of a perpetual allegory and shadow of the work of redemption to follow." [Bacon, Conf. of Faith.] The Sabbath unites these two natures of figure. It was a ceremony of the law, but mixed up largely with the internal history and polity of Israel.

First, as regards the notion of rest. In Heb. iii. and iv. are combined in one argument the rest from the works of creation and the rest of Canaan. This shews that in the Fourth Commandment as in Deuteronomy, Gen. ii. 2 is no longer a mere record of creation but an anticipation of Christianity. In Hebrews Christ is primarily spoken of. He hath ceased from His works, as God ceased from the works of creation. In Him we enter into rest, the rest of Matt. xi. 28, when we cease from our own works. That which the Sabbath in this respect prefigured is the normal condition of Christianity.

Secondly, One great aim of Sabbaths was to debar the Hebrew from the thought of absolute ownership of anything. His time was not his own, his land was not his own, but God's. [Lev. xxv. 23. Smith's Dict. of Bible, vol. iii. p. 1067.] Now, while it is true [SUNDAY] that God condescends to accept from us as if we were really possessors, so that our offerings are free-will offerings, it is no less true that all we have is not our own but God's. It is one of the many Christian paradoxes. The Christian is "rich in poverty, and poor in the midst of riches. He believes all the world to be his, yet he dares take nothing without special leave from God." [Bacon, Characters of a Believing Christian.]

Thirdly, The remission of debts and the release of bondmen in the Sabbatical and Jubilee years, at once refer us to the words with which our Lord opened His ministry at Nazareth [Luke iv. 18.]

Such were the anticipations of Christianity. But Christ being come, our allegiance to God is otherwise expressed than in Sabbaths: the substance being come the figure is vanished: that which was made glorious had no glory in this respect by reason of the glory which excelleth.

SABELLIANISM. Little is known of the history of Sabellius, the author of the heresy which bears his name. He was a presbyter, some say bishop, of Ptolemais in Upper Egypt, about the middle of the third century, and was preceded (as has been often observed of heretics in ecclesiastical history) by others, as Praxeas and Noëtus, who maintained opinions in some degree resembling his own. Sabellius, supposing that the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity was inconsistent with the unity of the Godhead, denied the distinction of the three Divine Persons; he maintained that God was one Person only, called according to His manifestation in the work of man's salvation either the Father, the Son, or the Holy Ghost—one hypostasis or essence (as St. Epiphanius says) with three names (ἐν μία ὑποστάσει τρεῖς ὀνομασίας). Hence his followers were called Patripassians, as they were supposed to hold (the consequence of their theory) that the Father suffered on the Cross. But Sabellius denied this inference, and not without reason, according to his own statement or illustrations. Thus, as St. Epiphanius says, he compared the Trinity to the body, soul, and spirit of a man; or to the orb, light, and heat of the sun: according to the latter illustration, he did not really believe that the Son was the same person as the Father, but an emanation from Him. St. Athanasius has thus described the Sabellian theory, "the Monad was expanded (ἐπλατύνθη) into a trinity; the Trinity is Father, and Son, and Holy Ghost. Thus the Father Himself became also, according to Sabellius, Son and Spirit" [Oratio iv. contra Arianos, sec. 13]. These "expansions" of the Godhead (called μορφάι, σχήματα, ἐνεργεῖαι) resemble the Gnostic theory of emanation: the Son and the Holy Ghost are not represented as eternal Persons, but only as a temporary manifestation of the Godhead for the work of redemption; the Godhead afterwards becoming, according to its original state, a Monad, without distinction in itself.

The opinions of Sabellius were confuted by St. Dionysius of Alexandria and of Rome, by Epiphanius [Contra Sabellianos, Hæres. 42 sive 62], and Theodoret [Hæret. Fabul. comp. lib. ii. c. 9]. There was still a sect of Sabellians in the fourth century in Rome and Mesopotamia. [Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

SABIANS. The Sabians, otherwise Nazaræans or Mendæans, profess to have been originally the Baptist's disciples; that they were driven from Syria by the Moslems, and took refuge in Persia; where, in the middle of the seventeenth century, they formed a community of 25,000 families [Ignatius a Jesu, Christian. S. Joh.]. They also penetrated into India. The language of their sacred books being Aramæan, similar to that of the Jerusalem and Babylonian Talmud, gives credibility to their tradition. Their religion makes a nearer approach to the principles of Zoroaster than to those of either the New or Old Testament. The Jewish Cabbala and the Korân also supply a contingent; St. John is the principal figure in their scheme, the Saviour and the Holy Spirit being regarded by them in very much the same light in which the Gnostics regarded their Demiurge, as the "Deus sævior."

Their system of emanations from a dualism of the male Ferha (Ferouer of the Avesta) and the female principle Azar, is altogether similar to that of the Persian theosophy: Mana, the Lord of light, stands next, and after him a succession of angels of light, like the Valentinian Æons; opposed to whom is the kingdom of darkness or Ur, to be identified with the Chaldæan principle of the same name [Boulland, H. Univ. i. 40, ii. 279]. Ur with six other evil spirits inhabit the seven planets, like the Hebdomad of Valentinus, or the seven Amshaspands of Zoroaster [Irenæus, Cambr. ed. i. 44, note 1]. Adam and Eve were created by Mana, and "their souls descended into them in a garden of trees." Sabians have little in common with ZABIANISM.

The Baptist, who closed the Sabian theological system, was called by them Anush, or "one of the people;" thus "Anush art thou, but I will make thee as one of the kings" [Cod. Nazar. Norberg, 9]. Baptism is their most solemn rite, and is indispensable for the remission of sins; infant baptism being practised by them. Mahommedans are disliked by them in a greater degree than Christians or Jews, owing to the persecutions they have endured. Their sacred books, so far as they are known to us, are [1] the Divan [Ignatius a Jesu, Narratio, &c.], professedly antemundane, but mentioning Mahomet; [2] The Book of John, or Conversations of Angels; [3] The Book of the Zodiac, on astrology—these exist only in fragments; [4] Cholasteh, discoursing of the means and conditions of salvation; [5] The Book of Adam, which is the Codex Nazaræus, edited in Aramaic, and with a Latin translation by Norberg. It makes use of the Scriptures of the Old Testament, but apparently by means of a Targum. Thus the words, "Woe to them who drink young wine early in the morning, and in the evening old wine, charmed with song and harp and pipe," are suggested by the Targum on Isa. v. 11 and 22, "Woe to them who rise early in the morning to drink old wine, . . . and inebriate themselves with old wine." So Isa. xxxiv. 4 is copied in the Book of Adam. "The earth falleth into the pit, the heavens are rolled up as a covering, the brightness of the sun is extinct, and the beauty of the moon is gone, the stars and zodiacal signs fall like drops." Their demonology is altogether borrowed from Talmudic sources. [See Gesenius on Isa. xxxiv. 14. Norberg, de Orig. et Lingua Sabæorum; Liber Adami. Walch, de Sabæis. Tittman, Meletemata Sacra, p. 15. Herzog, Mendaër.]

SACRAMENTALS. A scholastic term for rites which have, in some degree, a sacramental nature, but are not included among the seven sacraments as generally enumerated by theologians. It includes, says Durandus, "all such rites as have been instituted by the Church after Christ," rites which the Church can institute, and which the Church also can alter, or dispense with altogether. He gives, as examples of such sacramentals, the benediction of persons, vestments, and holy water; as also the coronations of kings, the consecration of altars, churches, vessels, and things of that sort [Durand. in Sent. lib. iv. dist. 2, qu. 2]. St. Thomas Aquinas lays down the distinction between sacraments and the rites called sacramentals, that the latter have not necessarily any inward grace accompanying the outward sign [Prim. Sec. qu. cviii. 2], but he does not use the word itself. In recent times some English writers have applied the term to the five sacraments of which there is no recorded institution by our Lord.

SACRAMENTARIANS. The name given by Roman theologians of the sixteenth century to those Protestants who followed Carlstadt, Zwingle, and Calvin, in an entire denial of the real presence of Christ in the Holy Eucharist.

Though in no way associated with this use of the name, it was revived in the last century, as a designation of the Wesleys and their friends at Oxford. The name was given to them on account of their persistent attendance at weekly communion in St. Mary's Church at a time when frequent communion had become rare. But it was soon superseded by the meaningless name of "Methodists."

SACRAMENTS. Divinely appointed mystical rites in which God causes material substances and verbal forms to convey Spiritual Substance and Grace.

I. HISTORY OF THE TERM. In classical Latin the word "Sacramentum" meant [1] the pecuniary "recognizances" deposited in a sacred place by each of the litigants in a suit at law [Varro, de Linguâ Latin. lib. iv.; Festus, de Verb. Significat. s. v.], and [2] the sacred military oath by which soldiers were bound to allegiance and obedience [Liv. ix. 29, xxii. 36; Festus, de Verb. Significat. s. v.; Aul. Gellius, xvi. 4]. This oath was taken upon the "signa militaria," or consecrated "signs" which surmounted each regimental banner. It was probably an association between the sacred signs and the sacred deposits which connected these two senses together under the same word.

The early ecclesiastical use of the word had reference most frequently to Baptism, doubtless from the idea of enrolling a convert under Christ's banner by a vow of obedience, as the soldier was enrolled by his "Sacramentum." Thus Tertullian uses it when speaking of the baptismal abjuration in at least three places [Tertull. de Coron. xiii., de Idololat. vi., de Spectac. 24; Cf. Sentent. Cæcil. in Conc. Carth. vii.; Routh's Reliq. Sacr. iii. 116]. He also speaks of our Lord's baptism as the sacrament of unction [Tertull. Adv. Prax. xxviii.]—the use of unction being then associated with all public baptisms [Tertull. de Bapt. vii.]; and in disclaiming the monstrous charge of infanticide brought against the early Christians, he scornfully calls it a wicked charge respecting a "Sacrament of infanticide" [Tertull. Apolog. vii.], which use of the word seems also to be associated with Baptism. More directly still, however, Tertullian calls baptism "Sacramentum aquæ" [Tertull. de Bapt. i. xii.], "Sacramentum lavacri" [Tertull. de Virg. Veland. ii.], and "Sacramentum fidei" [Tertull. de Anima, i.]: while in one place he names in perfectly unambiguous language the "Sacramentum Eucharistiæ" [Tertull. de Coron. iii.], shewing that the term had already been extended in its use to something more than the idea of enrolment on beginning service as a Christian soldier.

In the writings of St. Cyprian the word is used chiefly as the equivalent of μυστήριον.[1] Thus he calls the many mysteries contained in the Lord's Prayer "Sacramenta," and speaks of the "Sacrament of life" [Cypr. de Orat. Dominica, ix. xxviii.]. But, on the other hand, he also distinctly uses the word in connexion with Baptism and the Eucharist. In speaking of the admission of heretics to the Church, he says, that they should be led to the truth both of unity and faith "per omnia divinæ gratiæ sacramenta" [Cypr. Ep. lxx.]. On the same subject he also speaks of being born of each sacrament [ibid. lxxii. si sacramento utroque nascantur] apparently calling baptism and unction separate sacraments, and quoting our Lord's words to Nicodemus as his authority; the same expression being used by Nemesian in his "Sentence" [Reliq. Sacr. iii. 117]. Elsewhere, writing of persecution, he speaks of Christians as being bound together by the "Sacramentum unanimitatis" [Cypr. Ep. lix. al. liv.], which is evidently a reference to Holy Communion; and, when writing directly of the Holy Eucharist, he frequently applies the word "Sacramentum" to it [ibid. lxiii.]. By the time of St. Jerome and St. Augustine the ecclesiastical use of the word in its present sense seems to have become settled.

[1] In the Vulgate it is also used for μυστήριον, as for example in Wisd. ii. 22, "Et nescierunt sacramenta Dei," in 1 Tim. iii. 16, "Et manifeste magnum est

II. Definition of the Term. The ordinary definitions of a sacrament are founded on words of St. Augustine. "A visible sacrifice, therefore," he writes, "is a sacrament, or sacred sign, of an invisible sacrifice" [Aug. de Civit. Dei, x. 5]. And again, "Concerning the sacrament, indeed, which he is receiving, when it has been well impressed upon him that things visible are indeed signs of things invisible, but that in them the things invisible are themselves honoured . . ." [Aug. de Catech. Rud. xxvi.]. In mediæval theology this became "Sacramentum est invisibilis gratiæ visibilis forma, ejusdem gratiæ imaginem gerens, et causa existens" [Lombard, Sentent. lib. iv. dist. i.]. The Catechism of the Council of Trent adopts it in the form, "A Sacrament is a visible sign of an invisible grace, instituted for our justification" [Catech. Trident. II. i. 4]. The form of it adopted by the Church of England is, a sacrament is "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us, ordained by Christ Himself as a means whereby we receive the same, and a pledge to assure us thereof" [Catech. in Book of Com. Prayer].

III. The Number of the Sacraments has been reckoned as seven from very early ages, that number being recognised by the Eastern and Western Churches, and by the Monophysite and Nestorian sects; which latter are not likely to have borrowed it from either of the former since their separation in the fifth century. But although this association of sacraments with the number seven is probably very ancient, the same seven mysteries were not always enumerated, and there is probably good foundation for the common statement that the present enumeration originated in the Latin Church with Peter Lombard [d. A.D. 1164] in the twelfth century, the first writer in whom it is found [Lombard, Sentent. lib. iv. dist. ii.]. There is, however, by no means a general uniformity among mediæval theologians as to the number. Rupertus Tuitensis, writing about the same time as Peter Lombard, says, "Sacred Baptism, the Holy Eucharist of His Body and Blood, the twin gift of the Holy Ghost. . . . These three sacraments are the necessary instruments of our salvation" [Rupert. Tuitens. de Victor. Verb. Dei, xii. 11]. Alexander of Hales [d. A.D. 1245] and the holy Buonaventura [d. A.D. 1274] both denied the Apostolic origin of Confirmation; and it was not until the Council of Florence [A.D 1439] that the number, as given by Lombard, and after him by St. Thomas Aquinas, was authoritatively defined. It was then done in a synodal epistle from the Pope Eugenius to the Armenians [Labb. Concil. xiii. 534]. The definition was reiterated by the Council of Sens, or Paris [A.D. 1528, ibid. xiv. 454], and finally adopted by the Council of Trent [sess. vii. can. i.], in the year 1547.

But the Council of Trent, while it decreed that the sacraments are neither more nor less than seven, also decreed, "If any one shall say that these seven sacraments are equal to each other in such wise as that one is not in any way more worthy than another, let him be anathema" [sess. vii. can. iii.]. This is reasserted in the Catechism of the Council issued in the year 1566, where the following passage on the subject is found: "It is, however, especially to be noticed, that although all the sacraments possess a divine and admirable efficacy, yet all are not of equal necessity and dignity, nor is the significancy of all one and the same. Amongst them three are said to be necessary beyond the rest, although the necessity is not of the same kind in all the three." These are Baptism, Penance, and Order; but "the Eucharist is far superior to the rest in holiness, as well as in the number and greatness of its mysteries" [Catech. Trident. II. i. 22]. This statement is founded on that of St. Thomas Aquinas [Summa Theol. III. lxv. 4].

The mediæval enumeration has been adopted by the Church of England with a similar limitation though not the same. Thirty years before the Tridentine Catechism was printed and published, the "Institution of a Christian Man" had been set forth by the English Convocations [A.D. 1537], in which was the following statement: "Although the sacraments of Matrimony, of Confirmation, of Holy Orders, and of Extreme Unction, have been of long time past received and approved by the common consent of the Catholic Church, to have the name and dignity of sacraments, as indeed they be well worthy to have, (forasmuch as they be holy and godly signs, whereby, and by the prayer of the minister, be not only signified and represented, but also given and conferred, some certain and special gifts of pietatis sacramentum," and in Eph. v. 32, "Sacramentum hoc magnum est." The latter passage is so quoted by Tertullian [Tertull. de Jejun. iii.], which seems to shew that the word "Sacramentum" was used as the equivalent of μυστήριον, in the primitive Latin version of the New Testament used by the African Church.

Sacraments

the Holy Ghost, necessary for Christian men to have for one godly purpose or other, like as it hath been before declared); yet there is a difference in dignity and necessity between them and the other three sacraments, that is to say, the sacraments of Baptism, of Penance, and of the Altar, and that for divers causes. First, because these three sacraments be instituted of Christ, to be as certain instruments or remedies necessary for our salvation, and the attaining of everlasting life. Second, because they be also commanded by Christ to be ministered and received in their outward visible signs. Thirdly, because they have annexed and conjoined unto their said visible signs such spiritual graces, as whereby our sins be remitted and forgiven, and we be perfectly renewed, regenerated, purified, justified, and made the very members of Christ's mystical body, so oft as we worthily and duly receive the same."

The twenty-fifth Article of Religion [A.D. 1571] stated "There are two sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the Gospel, that is to say, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord;" and it goes on to add that the other five "have not like nature of sacraments . . . for that they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God." In the latter part of the Catechism, which was added in the year 1604, it is also said that the number of the sacraments "generally," i.e., universally,[1] "necessary to salvation" is "two only . . . that is to say, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord."[2]

In the modern Eastern Church the "Seven Mysteries" are the same as in the Western Church, Baptism and the Holy Eucharist taking, of course, the crowning portion of the whole number, as to dignity and necessity.

IV. Position of Sacraments in the Economy of Grace. As the two greater and the five lesser sacraments are all treated of in detail under the respective headings of Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Penance [and Absolution], Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony, it is not necessary here to go into any particulars respecting them; but a few words may be added as to their relation to the economy of grace.

The general object of sacraments is to counteract the effect of the Fall on the life of each particular recipient, and this object is effected by the conveyance of grace to him, for the particular purpose for which the sacrament is administered. Thus, in Holy Baptism the grace of the sacrament is associated with forgiveness of sins, and with the access of those new spiritual qualities which difference a Christian nature from a heathen nature. In the Holy Eucharist grace is associated with the presence of Christ's Body and Blood, which are contained in and conveyed by the material substances used in the sacrament. In both cases the object is to elevate human nature by bringing an individual part of it into union with God. Hence sacraments have been called the "extension of the Incarnation" [Bishop Taylor's Worthy Communicant, i. 2], the exaltation of human nature, accomplished in the One Man Christ Jesus, by taking human nature into the Godhead, being accomplished in other men by a spiritual engrafting into Him Who is thus God and Man, and by a communication to them of His Body and Blood.

This office of sacraments is such as can be distinctly and definitely predicated only of the two greater ones, which shews the wisdom of the Church of England in keeping to the ancient practice of placing them in a position by themselves.[3] Even setting aside the question whether or not any of the lesser sacraments were "ordained by Christ Himself," it is evident that they hold a subordinate position in the economy of grace, and although they effect much they do not effect actual spiritual union with Him. Yet the lesser sacraments are analogous to the greater in the quality of conveying grace, though not on a level with them as to the special gift associated with that grace. "The laying on of a Bishop's hands for Confirmation conveys grace for the establishment of the confirmed Christian in the state of salvation to which he was brought by Baptism. Absolution conveys grace to the penitent for the pardon of past sins, and the loosing of the soul from their bondage and power. The anointing of the dying conveys grace to their souls, to strengthen them in the last weakness of their bodies. The laying on of episcopal hands in Holy Orders, conveys grace to those who are made deacons, priests, or bishops, that the work done by them in the name of Christ may have efficacious power as His work. The solemn benediction of man and woman in Holy Matrimony conveys grace to them, that they may live together without sin, and that they may bring children into the world to be added to the family of God" [Blunt's Sacraments and Sacram. Ordin. p. 28]. And while it is true that some of the five lesser sacraments are analogous to benedictions, in which verbal forms only are used, it is also true that the analogy is not such as to bring them to the same level. It would be as unwise, therefore, to dissociate these five from the idea of sacraments as it would be to elevate them to the same level with the two great sacraments of the Gospel. They really occupy an intermediate ground; and it is not easy to see what else can be exactly classed with them. It is quite possible that the number five does not exhaust the list of such minor sacraments, yet they are nearer than benedictions, the sign of the Cross, the use of holy water, &c., to the place held by the greater sacraments in the economy of grace, and as such are more fit than any of the others to complete the mystical number so generally associated with the operations of the Holy Ghost.

[1] See Blunt's Annot. Book of Common Prayer, p. 249.

[2] There is also a well-known passage in the Homily of Common Prayer and Sacraments in which the five Sacraments are said to be "godly states of life," &c., but not sacraments in the full sense in which the other two are. The same language is found in the best English divines of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

[3] This ancient practice is illustrated by a large body of references in Bishop Forbes' Explanation of the XXXIX. Articles, p. 448, note.

SACRIFICATI. [Lapsed.]

SACRIFICE. The offering of sacrifices to God reaches back to the very cradle of the human race. As soon as the promise was made that of the seed of the woman a Deliverer should be raised up who should bruise the head of man's powerful enemy, sacrifice was also instituted to shew forth by a significant emblem the way in which that victory should be won; that without the shedding of blood there could be no remission of sin. With the reason for this divine dispensation we can have nothing to do; the fact itself is patent in every book of Scripture. The sacrifice of Abel is the first animal sacrifice on record; and it was accepted because it was an animal sacrifice, and shewed forth the death of Christ in sacramental significance, which Cain's offering of the fruits of the earth did not. [Vicarious Sacrifice.] The same may be said of the sacrifices offered up by Noah after the Flood, and by Abraham when God made His solemn covenant with him, and wherever else we read of the offering of blood as a religious rite. Our Lord plainly intimated that this was the meaning of sacrifice, and that His own precious death on the cross was the final cause of the institution of the Jewish altar, when he declared of the Cup of Blessing that it was "the blood of the New Covenant, which was shed for the remission of sin" [Matt. xxvi. 28]. His own death was the substance, the life of bulls and goats taken under the Law was the shadow; the two together formed one verity ordained from everlasting, the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, to which we look with thankful hearts as procuring for us the pardon that we need, and that we look for in vain elsewhere. It is the satisfaction for sin, according to the expressive term of Anselm; a compensation for that which cannot be wholly undone, but which replaces us in the condition of humanity before sin entered into the world, and death by sin. [Satisfaction.]

The idea of sacrifice, vague and indefinite before, and possibly kept in abeyance during the Egyptian bondage [Exod. viii. 26], was set forth sharp and clear in the paschal sacrifice. It spoke more definitely than any other of the sacrifice of the death of Christ [Satisfaction. Vicarious Sacrifice. Passover]; and gave its tone to the whole theory of the Mosaic code. [Blood. Atonement.] Thenceforth the blood of the victim poured out on the "bottom of the altar," or sprinkled on its side [Lev. v. 9], ascribed life to the Lord of life; and when applied to the priests and people, quickened them symbolically with the life of heaven. It was the blood of the covenant of life, and the antagonism of the death brought in by Adam. The patriarchal sacrifice was as the Eucharistic peace-offering or burnt-offering [Exod. xxix. 38-42] of the Mosaic scheme. The sin-offering, as the more direct type of the sacrifice of the death of Christ [Lev. xvi.; Numb. xxviii. xxix.], was first prescribed when Moses received the command, "See that thou make all things according to the pattern that I shewed to thee in the mount" [Heb. viii. 5]. Doubtless the whole mysterious doctrine of the Atonement, and sacramental union of shadow and substance, was then clearly revealed to him; and as he was afterwards permitted to appear upon the Mount of Transfiguration, and to speak plainly with the Saviour, as he had before spoken in types and shadows, of the death that the Blessed Lamb of God should accomplish, so in the mount "that burned with fire," the Saviour bearing the banner of salvation was revealed to him, and declared the whole scheme of redemption from the significant rites of the Law to the outspoken Word of Truth in the Incarnate Son of God.

The sacrifices of the Law as a complex idea lead in direct course to the θυσία ἀναίμακτος of the Holy Eucharist. For they were [1] propitiatory, as the sin-offering of which the offerer was not allowed to partake, to shew his unworthiness to receive the least of God's mercies; and which must of necessity be first offered and restore the sacrificant to communion with God [Reconciliation] before the [2] burnt-offering could be accepted, which, as a dedication of the individual in thought, word, and deed to God, was of a devotional character. They were also [3] of an Eucharistic nature, as peace and thank-offerings of the first-fruits, which were consumed by the sacrificant at the Lord's table; in all which particulars the unbloody sacrifice of the Holy Eucharist is the sacramental complement of the sacrifices of the law. It is not merely commemorative; but it is an Eucharistic oblation of the fruits of the earth to the service of the God of all blessing; it is dedicatory, whereby we offer ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be a reasonable, holy and lively sacrifice to the Lord of the altar; and it is propitiatory, for through faith in the blood of the cross once offered, it becomes a full, perfect and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world, and for those of each faithful communicant in particular. In the union of these three particulars consists the essence of a worthy reception of The Bread and The Cup of Blessing; but they were all and severally shewn forth in the sacrifices of Israel of old. [Eucharistic Sacrifice, p. 252. Spencer De Legib. Hebr. Outram, De Sacrif. Smith's Dict. of Bible. Herzog. Opfer Cultus. Winer. Magee On the Atonement. Johnson's Unbloody Sacrifice.]

SACRILEGE. The crime of profaning sacred things, or things devoted to the service of God, whether by way of wanton insult or outrage offered to such things, or by the unlawful appropriation of them to secular uses. [Consecration. Secularization.] Sacrilege of the former kind is an offence cognizable by the Ecclesiastical Courts. That crime which is known as sacrilege at common law consists in a felonious taking of any goods out of a church or chapel, and was punished in former times with extreme severity. It appears to have been the only felony which deprived the offender of the privilege of sanctuary and (according to some) of the Benefit of clergy. It is still a felony, but its punishment has undergone the general mitigation extended to the penalties of criminal law.

SAINT. This word is derived from the Latin adjective "sanctus," which is the equivalent of the Greek adjective ἅγιος, and the Hebrew קָדוֹשׁ, holy, or חָסִיד, pious. It is often used substantively, both in the Old and the New Testaments, as when Aaron is called "the saint of the Lord" [Psa. cvi. 16]: when Daniel heard "saint" speaking to "saint" in his prophetic vision [Dan. viii. 13, cf. vii. 18, 21, 27]: when Moses spoke of the Lord coming with "ten thousands of saints" [Deut. xxxiii. 2]: David of the "assembly" and "congregation of the saints" [Psa. lxxxix. 5, 7]: St. Matthew of the "many bodies of the saints which slept" that "arose at our Lord's resurrection" [Matt. xxvii. 52]: Ananias in his vision of the "saints" whom Saul had persecuted [Acts ix. 13, cf. xxvi. 10]: St. Paul himself, in many places, of the "saints" to whom he addressed his epistles [Rom. i. 7; Eph. i. 1, &c.], to whom alms were sent by the Church [1 Cor. xvi. 1], or whom he and others salute as brethren in Christ [Rom. xvi. 15; 1 Cor. xiii. 13]. In all these cases, and in others of a similar kind in the Old and New Testaments, the word "saint" simply means "holy person," either [1] positively holy, as having been holy in life and death, and as such, being a "saint" in the unseen world before the presence of the All Holy: or [2] conditionally holy, as being dedicated to God by special separation. In the second sense the people of Israel were a "congregation of saints," and Christian people in general "churches of the saints" [1 Cor. xiv. 33], because they have been in each case dedicated by God to Himself as His "peculiar treasure" [Exod. xix. 5; Psa. cxxxv. 4], and "peculiar people" [Deut. xiv. 2; Tit. ii. 14; 1 Pet. ii. 9], intended for a life of specially near relation to Him Who is the Fountain of sanctity.

Towards the close of the Apostolic age the term began to be used in a more restricted sense, St. John in the Book of Revelation applying it almost, if not quite exclusively to martyrs; and giving to our Lord the title "King of saints" [Rev. xv. 3], as being at the head of those who "had got the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark."

In later ages martyrs have received the name of saints as especially their due, the general opinion of the Fathers and of theologians having been that their martyrdom won for them immediate access to heaven, without passing through the intermediate state. But the term is used in a wider sense also, as in the article of the Creed, "I believe in the communion of the saints," and the general application of it to all the holy dead, whether "saints in paradise" or "saints in heaven."

Eucharistic commemoration of particular martyrs is co-eval with Christian martyrdom itself: and as the number of martyrs soon increased beyond the power of enumeration, a commemoration of the saints in general was added to that of those who were individually named. The annual commemoration of the day of a martyr's departure soon also developed into the festivals known as "saints' days," by which, even before His Second Coming, the King of saints is "glorified in His saints" [2 Thess. i. 10], while "their virtuous and godly living" is set forth as an example, and a vivid sense is kept up of the "communion and fellowship" which in God's "elect" are "knit together in one communion in the mystical body of His Son."

The formal designation of particular persons as saints is treated of elsewhere [BEATIFICATION. CANONIZATION. DIPTYCHS], as also are the relations of the saints in bliss to the Church militant. The great repository of information respecting their lives is the Bollandist Acta Sanctorum which already extends to sixty folio volumes [COMMUNION OF SAINTS. INTERCESSION OF SAINTS. INVOCATION OF SAINTS.]

SANCTIFICATION [ἁγιασμός]. The progressive renewal of body and soul by which those who are born unholy are made holy. It begins in holy Baptism, when the "children of wrath" [Eph. ii. 3] are "called to be saints" [1 Cor. i. 2]; its development is effected by the work of the Holy Spirit co-operating with their will [Rom. xv. 16; 2 Cor. vii. 1; 1 Thess. iv. 3, 4; 1 Pet. i. 15]; and its completion is the final degree of holiness by which they are made "meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light" [Col. i. 14].

Thus Sanctification [ἁγιασμὸς] is the spiritual process by which a fallen man becomes a saint [sanctus, ἅγιος]. In its first stage it is contemporary with Justification, the two being, in fact, only two different phases of the same thing, the one phase, justification, representing the relation between the renewed person and Him by Whom he is renewed, the other, sanctification, representing the condition or nature of the person renewed. The first stage of sanctification, therefore, the renewal of our fallen nature by baptismal regeneration, may be identified with the state of justification as distinguished from the relation of justification. He who is made righteous, or justified, is necessarily made holy, or sanctified. This first stage of the process of sanctification, like all other stages, is entirely effected by the grace of God, but in the case of infants it does not require the co-operation of the person to be sanctified. In all subsequent stages, however, the grace of God can be received and retained only by the co-operation in will and deed of the person to be sanctified; and hence the sanctification of all responsible persons is associated with faith, by which the grace of God is received, and with good works, which are the fruit of that grace and the evidence of sanctification.

The controversies which have been carried on by Lutherans and Calvinists with Catholics respecting justification and sanctification have been founded in the use of the two terms by the former, as if they were respectively identical with "favour" and "grace." Sanctification has thus been treated of as an operating power, instead of being taken in its proper and literal sense as the name of a condition brought about by such a power. [SPIRIT, THE HOLY.]

SANHEDRIN. The chief tribunal of the Jews. The name is a corruption of the Greek συνέδριον after the analogy of סניגוריא and other words of the same nature. Several strange derivations of the word have been coined by those who were anxious to avoid the Gentile name, e.g. סו חדרין, the law-seekers, סונאי דורונות, the bribe-haters. The word סנהדרין does not occur in the Hebrew of the Old Testament, though in the LXX. we meet with συνέδριον, γερουσία, γερουσία καὶ πρεσβύτεροι. In the Targum, as might be expected, the word is not of unfrequent occurrence, e.g. Ruth iv. i. ובועז סליק לתרע בית דינא דסבהדרין ויתיב תחן; and Cant. vi. 2, where in the eulogium of the Paraphrast upon the Sanhedrin, we have a marvellous specimen of exegesis. Josephus speaks of the συνέδριον, and of the γερουσία καὶ οἱ ἱερεῖς καὶ οἱ γραμματεῖς τοῦ ἱεροῦ. In the New Testament (especially in St. John's Gospel) the members of the Sanhedrin are called Ἰουδαῖοι, and occasionally Φαρισαῖοι, while in Acts v. 21 we read of τὸ συνέδριον καὶ πᾶσα ἡ γερουσία.

The reference in all these passages is probably to the greater Sanhedrin, which forms the subject of this article. There were, besides this, lesser Sanhedrins, consisting of twenty-three members, and judicial assemblies consisting of no more than three judges. Of the constitution and powers of these very little is known. Probably our Lord refers to them in Matt. x. 17, παραδώσουσιν ὑμᾶς εἰς τὰ συνέδρια.

The origin of the Greater Sanhedrin is very obscure. That there were legal courts in early times of Divine institution is plain from Scripture, but that these were identical with the Sanhedrin of the New Testament is merely a Jewish conjecture. The Mishna [Sanhedr. i. sec. 6] connects the institution of it with Numb. xi. 16. There may be a reference to this last named court in Deut. xvii. 8. The place of judgment was the gate of the city [Deut. xvii. 5]. The judges were the זקבים [Deut. xxv. 7], but the number of elders whose presence was essential to constitute a court, or the qualification which entitled a man to be an elder, are unknown. All that can be said of these courts is, that their decision was not final, and that if the question was too difficult for them to determine, it was to be referred to the priests, the Levites, and to the judge for the time being [Deut. xvii. 9].

If, then, the Great Sanhedrin was identical with the assembly mentioned in Numb. xi. 16, we should expect to find references to it in the later books of the Bible. Lightfoot says that it exercised authority in the time of the Judges. "The first forty years that followed after Joshua's death, are ascribed to the rule of Othniel [Judg. iii. 11], not that Othniel was sole ruler or monarch in the land, for the Sanhedrin or great council bare rule in their places, and inferior magistrates in their's, but that Othniel was a valiant and fortunate commander in the wars, and wrought special deliverance for the people." He thinks that the Sanhedrin sat at Mizpeh, where Saul was appointed king, and that in the time of Solomon Jaazaniah was chief. That it existed in the time of the Judges is contrary to Judg. ii. 8-11, 18, 19, and to the words so frequently repeated in that book, "Every man did that which was right in his own eyes." And even if it began to exist with the monarchy, that it should have had any great authority is inconsistent with the narrative of David on his death-bed appointing Solomon to be his successor.

The story of Naboth [1 Kings xxi. 8] speaks of a judicial body consisting of elders and nobles [הזקנים והחורים] who possessed power over life and death [see also 1 Kings xx. 7]. This may be the same body as that instituted by David just before his death [1 Chron. xxiii. 3, 4, xxvi. 29], which was in after times reconstructed by Jehoshaphat, and restored by Josiah [2 Chron. xix. 8-11, xxxiv. 13]. But the break in Jewish history after the death of Nehemiah prevents us from connecting this early institution with the Sanhedrin described in the Talmud. The Greek name would warrant the hypothesis that the Sanhedrin was not instituted till after the building of the second Temple, and at a time when the Greek language was so familiar to the Jews, that it was more natural for them to clothe a Greek word with Hebrew letters than to use the Hebrew words בית דין הגדול. This being the case, in the passage 1 Macc. i. 26, ἄρχοντες καὶ πρεσβύτεροι would refer to the senators forming the greater Sanhedrin, and xii. 6, 2 Macc. i. 10, iv. 44, where we find γερουσία [cf. Judith iv. 8, ἡ γερουσία παντὸς δήμου Ισραὴλ οἱ ἐκάθηντο ἐν Ιερουσαλήμ], and 3 Macc. i. 8, γερουσία καὶ πρεσβύτεροι would refer to this same body. We read in Josephus [Bell. Jud. I. viii. 5] that Gabinius, Pompey's general, established five Sanhedrins [συνόδους, different from the council of seven mentioned, Antiq. IV. viii. 14] at Jerusalem, Gadara, Amathus, Jericho, and Sepphoris. These would probably be the lesser Sanhedrins to which any city was entitled that had 120 (or according to others 230) inhabitants. The next historical record concerning the Sanhedrin is that Herod murdered all the members on his accession. It revived, however, under the presidency of Hillel, who died in about the twelfth year of our Lord. We have sufficient evidence as to its existence and powers in the New Testament. Our Lord refers to the dangerous power which it possessed in His day [Matt. v. 22], and St. Stephen's martyrdom points to the great increase of power which it had gained during the few years that had elapsed since the Crucifixion. It escaped the general overthrow at the destruction of Jerusalem, and migrated to Jabneh. The reign of Hadrian was a trying time to the Jews, and probably during the confusion attending the revolt of Bar-Chochab the Sanhedrin found it safer to recommence their wanderings. Starting from Jabneh, after a few flittings, they settled at Tiberias, a town close to the lake of that name. Here Rabbi Judah, surnamed the Holy, was president till after the death of Commodus. The labours of the Jews at Tiberias were directed to the composition of the Jerusalem Talmud, which according to Buxtorf [Tiberias, vi.] was completed about A.D. 230. Rabbi Judah was succeeded by his son Gamaliel, with whom the Sanhedrin expired.

We have less difficulty in determining the constitution than the origin of this assembly. It consisted of seventy-one judges who sat around a semicircle. The president, or Nasi, sat in the middle, on his right hand sat the Ab-Beth-Din, or vice-president, the most venerable member of the Sanhedrin, and on his left the חכם, or sage, (though this is not quite certain); at each extremity of the semicircle sat a scribe, the other judges being ranged in order of seniority to the right and left of the Nasi סנהדרין היתה כחצי גורן עגולה שיהו רואין זה את זה ושני סופרין חדיוני עמדין לפניהן אחד מימין ואחד משמאול וכתבו דברי המזכין ודברי המחייבין. [Mishn. Sanhedr. iv.] The court in which they sat was a place partly within the precincts of the temple called the "stone chamber" [לשכת גזית]. They met in general twice a week, on the second and fifth days of the week, and the sitting occupied the interval between morning and evening sacrifice. A heavy cause might, however, require more frequent sittings during the week, and might protract the sitting on any day to a later hour. The judges were selected from the smaller Sanhedrins. The knowledge of several languages was indispensable, as also were the following good qualities, wisdom, humility, fear of God, contempt of wealth, love of truth, love towards man, and a good name. Riches and personal appearance were a great recommendation. The following were among the disqualified:—Persons under twenty years of age (according to some, all under forty, but we have instances of one or two being admitted to this high position while under twenty), the blind, the mutilated, old men, and men without children. The king was disqualified from sitting, because it was unlawful to differ from him in opinion. The following offences disqualified a man, gambling, usury, and pigeon-training. The [latter offence, according to Rabbi Obadiah Bartenor, consisted in teaching pigeons to fly races, and involved a species of betting, or in training them to decoy those which belonged to other owners.

The Sanhedrin had power to sentence a criminal to die by one of the four deaths, burning, stoning, slaying with the sword, or strangulation. A capital trial was conducted as follows. The witness, being brought before the judges, assembled as described above, was charged to tender nothing in evidence which rested on hearsay or conjecture. He was reminded that in case an innocent man was put to death, his blood would be laid to the charge of the false witness and his seed for ever. Then seven questions were asked, each bearing upon the time and place at which the offence had taken place. The evidence was carefully recorded by each scribe, and compared with that given by the next witness. If the testimonies of the two agreed, the votes of the judges were taken. No one, however, was condemned in his absence, or without opportunity of defending himself; nor was sentence pronounced upon the same day on which the trial was finished; but two of the judges retired to review the case, and on the following day, if a majority of two judges declared the accused person to be guilty, sentence was pronounced and executed immediately.

Other causes came within the jurisdiction of the greater Sanhedrin which required less severe penalties. Many important questions were brought before it for settlement, amongst which are mentioned the appointment of the king, and the determination of the succession when there was any doubt; but the silence of Scripture upon this point, a silence as unaccountable as that of an English historian writing a history of his nation without speaking of the Court of Parliament, implies that the monarchy was extinct before the time when the Sanhedrin claimed the right of electing the monarch. The general tenor of these minor questions was of a very practical nature, such as settling the tribute, taking notice of those who were in arrear, and providing that the money when collected should be devoted to a proper purpose.

The literature on this subject is extensive. The following works are worthy of notice:—Selden, De Synedriis; Reland's Antiquities, part ii.; Lightfoot's Horæ Talmudicæ; Ewald, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, vol. iv.; Milman, History of the Jews, vol. ii.; Frankel, Der Gerichtliche Beweis nach Mosaisch-Talmudischen Rechte. The claims of the Jews to the Divine authority of the latter Sanhedrin are considered in The Old Paths, Nos. 43-46. The claims of the Roman Catholic Church to infallibility, so far as they are based upon the infallibility of the Sanhedrin, are discussed by Jackson, Comments on the Creed, bk. iii. chap. xiv.

SATAN. This is a Hebrew word (שָׂטָן) signifying an "adversary," and is used in a general sense in the following eight passages in the Old Testament, 1 Sam. xxix. 4, 2 Sam. xix. 22, 1 Kings v. 4 (where the Septuagint equivalent is ἐπίβουλος), 1 Kings xi. 25 (LXX. ἀντικείμενος), Numb. xxii. 22, 32, Psa. cix. 5 (LXX. διαβαλεῖν, εἰς διαβολήν, διάβολος), 1 Kings xi. 14, 23 (LXX. Satan), and in one passage in the New Testament where our Lord addresses St. Peter, Ὕπαγε ὀπίσω μου Σατανᾶ, σκανδαλον μου εἶ ὅτι οὐ φρονεῖς τὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἀλλὰ τὰ τῶν ἀνθρώπων. In three passages in the Old Testament, two in the deutero-canonical books, and in twenty-eight places in the New Testament (or thirty-three including parallel passages) the word occurs as a proper name to designate the enemy of the human race, and the author of man's fall and sin.

The existence of evil is one of those facts which has been regarded in various ways, but is too self-evident to have been ever denied. We may regard it with Origen as merely the negation of good, πᾶσα ἡ κακία οὐδέν ἐστιν, ἔπει καὶ οὐκ ὄν τυγχάνει [De Princip. ii. 9, 2]; with Leibnitz as threefold, metaphysical, physical, or moral, "Metaphysicum generatim consistit in rerum non intelligentium imperfectione, physicum accipitur speciatim de substantiarum intelligentium incommodis, morale de earum actionibus viciosis;" with Kant as twofold, absolute and relative, that is opposed to the absolutely or the relatively good. But however we regard or explain evil, the further and important question in the background remains unaffected: What is its source or origin? Scripture is distinct in attributing it to the active agency of a personal evil spirit, called Satan, and as we are immediately concerned at present with the account which Revelation affords to us in the Old and New Testaments of Satan and his nature and operations, it would be out of place to glance more than briefly at two theories with reference to the authorship of evil, which were widely embraced by mankind before the Christian era. These are the Dualistic and the Pantheistic. The Dualistic theory is of great antiquity, and of Eastern origin. Good and evil are, according to it, two distinct essences produced by two original principles, one of good and one of evil, from whose agency all the good and evil existing in the world have respectively flowed. Dualism assumed two main forms. [1.] Parseeism, or the religion of the ancient Persians, which taught that the universe was originally created by two rival powers, Ormuzd and Ahriman, i.e. light and darkness; the latter of whom, in noways subordinate, though perhaps inferior and destined eventually to be overcome, produced something evil for everything good which was produced by the former. [2.] Hylism, by which matter was regarded as an original principle of evil co-existent from eternity with God, and was looked upon either as feminine (Ὑλη) and passive, as in the Chinese cosmogony, or as neuter, as a formless mass, as among the Greeks. Dualism is chiefly interesting to us in consequence of the attempts made by various Gnostic sects to interweave it with Christian doctrines; it was taught in a more or less open form by Simon Magus, Neander, Cerinthus, Saturninus [A.D. 110-134], Basilides [A.D. 125], Valentinus [A.D. 140], Marcion [A.D. 150]: among whom Basilides and Saturninus inclined to the eternity of matter, the rest attributing its creation to a demiurge, whom some represented as a subordinate instrument of the divine will, and others as openly malignant and hostile to the supreme God. [Demiurge.]

The Pantheistic theory, instead of treating evil as something essentially different from good, regarded good and evil as only varying manifestations of one original principle. This was the basis of the old Hindu religion, and has reappeared in modified forms since the Christian era in the philosophy of Spinoza in the seventeenth, and of Schelling in the nineteenth century. The latter taught that good is the concord, evil the discord, of the individual with the universal will, but that both were one in God. Thus have men differed with regard to the origin and nature of evil. From the fact that the free action of a personal will is the only ultimate cause discovered in the visible world, some have been led by analogy to approach so closely to revealed truth as to refer evil to the personal agency of some spirit or demiurge; but the question really lies beyond the region of human cognizance, and it is only on turning to revelations made by Divine knowledge that we find an uniform and definite solution of our difficulties. In Holy Scripture, however, the following positions are clearly laid down:—

[1.] That all evil is caused by a malignant spirit hostile to God and called the devil, or Satan [1 John iii. 8].

[2.] That God therefore is Himself the author of evil only in this sense, that though able to prevent it, He has permitted it to exist [Isa. xlv. 7; 1 Kings xxii. 22].

[3.] That though permitted by God to exist, Satan is still under His control, and made subservient to His purpose [Prov. xvi. 4].

[4.] That He will ultimately overrule the machinations of the adversary to His own glory, when all evil will be seen by us to have been in complete accordance with perfect order and supreme rectitude [Rom. ix. 22, 23].

Accepting therefore this view of the origin of sin (that is, of moral evil as well as of physical evil), not as discoverable by reason but as revealed in the Word of God, and taking for granted the existence of Satan as its author, we proceed to consider his various names and titles, his personality and origin, his nature and attributes, his power and mode of action.

I. The Names and Titles of Satan given in Holy Scripture are as follows:—

[1.] ἀντιδίκος, the adversary and enemy of the human race, and of believers especially. This title, which is a literal translation of the Hebrew word "Satan," is applied to him by St. Peter, "Be sober, be vigilant, because your adversary the devil as a roaring lion walketh about seeking whom he may devour" [1 Pet. v. 8].

[2.] Ὁ διάβολος. This word, which is the commonest appellation of Satan in the New Testament, occurring no less than fifty-three times, including parallel passages, means literally a setter-at-variance (διά-βάλλω), but it had acquired in Greek the further and special meaning of setting at variance by means of slander — "a slanderer." Comparing the three passages where it is used in the New Testament as an epithet with this sense [1 Tim. iii. 2; 2 Tim. iii. 3; Tit. ii. 3], it will be seen that this slander is twofold; the misrepresentation of God to man, and the slander of man to God. An example of the first is given by Satan's words to Eve, "Ye shall not surely die, for God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil" [Gen. iii. 4, 5].[1]

[1] This misrepresentation of God as jealous of mankind's progress, or envious of his success, coincides with the erroneous view which pervaded heathen mythology as to the motives supposed to influence its false gods in their dealings with mankind. Take for an example the advice of Amasis to the prosperous Polycrates of Samos: ἡδὺ μὲν πυνθάνεσθαι ἄνδρα φίλον καὶ ξεῖνον ἐῦ πρήσσοντα· ἐμοὶ δὲ αἱ σαὶ μεγάλαι εὐτυχίαι οὐκ ἀρέσκουσι, τὸ θεῖον ἐπισταμένῳ ὡς ἐστι φθονερον [Herod. iii. 40]. Compare, too, the general sentiment pervading Æschylus' play of Prometheus Vinctus, in which the hero κοινὸν ὠφέλημα

On the other hand, we find an example of Satan attempting to slander man in the eyes of God in the Book of Job. The Devil, in describing that patriarch to God, tries to insinuate low motives for his rectitude, "Doth Job fear God for nought? Hast not Thou made an hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side. Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land: but put forth Thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse Thee to Thy face" [Job i. 9, 10, 11, ii. 4, 5]. It will not be thought necessary here to enter into the further question, Why Satan is permitted to debase the ideal of the Divinity in man's view, or how he can hope to blind the eyes of an omniscient God? The lesson for us to remember is the fact, that the Bible reveals Satan to us employing slander as one of his most efficacious means in promoting the rebellion of man against his Creator.

[3.] Abaddon (אֲבַדּוֹן, perdition), and its Greek equivalent, Apollyon the destroyer. The locusts, the instruments of Divine vengeance, are described as having "a king over them which is the angel of the bottomless pit, whose name in the Hebrew tongue is Abaddon, but in the Greek tongue hath his name Apollyon" [Rev. ix. 11]. There is some doubt, however, whether, in spite of the popular identification of the two, it is Satan himself who is referred to in this verse, or one of the chiefs of the bad angels. [Abaddon.]

[4.] Beelzebub [Syriac, Vulgate; Beelzebul in Greek MSS]. This title, as applied to Satan, is employed only on one occasion, where the Jews account for our Lord's power of healing demoniacs by saying, "This fellow doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub the prince of the devils [ἄρχων τῶν δαιμονίων, Matt. x. 25, xii. 24, 27]. Beelzebub was the name of the God of Ekron [2 Kings i. 2, 6]. He was the God of flies, or of that spontaneous generation of insects and flies in putrid bodies which did great harm to the land of the Philistines, and which may account for the Jews having identified him with Satan as the worker of the greatest mischief, the ἄρχων τῶν δαιμονίων. It is a Hebrew word derived according to some[1] from זְבוּל [= habitation], and its signification is master of the house [Matt. xii. 29], or lord of the dwelling in the sense of prince of the lower world, and of the power of the air [Eph. ii. 2]. According to others[2] it is connected with זֶבֶל = dung, a word which is sometimes used by Talmudical writers in a secondary and contemptuous sense for idols, whence Beelzebub is the Lord of idols, ἄρχων τῶν δαιμονίων; or interpreting it literally, the fly under which emblem the deity of Ekron was represented is the insect generated in dung and carrion, scarabæus pillularius, or dunghill beetle. [Baal.]

[5.] Belial. This Hebrew term, as employed by St. Paul, is generally accepted as the appellative of Satan as the personification of all that is lawless, = παράνομος, by which word it is translated in the LXX. [e.g. Judg. xix. 22; 2 Sam. xvi. 7, &c.]. St. Jerome [in Ep. iv.] explains it as "absque jugo, quod de collo suo Dei abjecerit servitutem." Bengel, however, commenting on 2 Cor. vi. 15, understands by Belial, not Satan personally, but "omnis colluvies antichristiana" [Bengel's Gnom. Nov. Test.].

[6.] Dragon. This word is used in twelve passages in the Revelation as an appellative of Satan, notably in Rev. xii. 9, "and the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent called the Devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world; he was cast out into the earth, and his devils were cast out with him." The reference is no doubt to the power and craft of which the dragon is the natural symbol, and to the form which Satan assumed in the temptation of Eve in the garden of Eden.

[7.] Serpent. It was under the form of a serpent that Satan seduced Eve [Gen. iii. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 3]. Hence this reptile became an emblem of craft, and Satan is called "that old serpent the Devil which deceiveth the whole world" [Rev. xii. 9].

[8.] Lucifer. This name only appears once in Holy Scripture [Isa. xiv. 12], which verse evidently from the context refers to the fall of the king of Babylon; but Christian commentators from St. Jerome downwards have interpreted it of the fall of Satan; perhaps from its similarity to Luke x. 18.

The following titles are also assigned to Satan in the New Testament. He is called the angel of the bottomless pit [Rev. ix. 11]. The prince of devils [Matt. xii. 24]. The prince of this world [John xii. 31; Luke iv. 6]. The God of this world [2 Cor. iv. 4]. The accuser of our brethren [Rev. xii. 10]. The tempter [Matt. iv. 3, ὁ πειράζων]. The deceiver [Rev. xx. 10, ὁ πλανῶν.]

II. The Personality and Origin of Satan are only very gradually revealed in the Old Testament, so much so that it is doubtful whether the patriarchs had any conception of him as an individual agent and a personal enemy of the Almighty. They seem rather to have regarded evil negatively as a falling away from the true God than as obedience to the seductions of an evil spirit. Even in the account of the Fall, Satan's personality being disguised under the form of a serpent, they would probably see only an animal agency at work; and it was reserved for the writers of the New Testament to declare explicitly the identity of Satan with the old serpent which deceived not only Adam and Eve, but the whole world [Rev. xii. 9]. In three places, however, Satan is unmistakeably referred to in a personal capacity; in 1 Chron. xxi. 1, where he tempts David to number the children of Israel; in Job i. 6, where he presents himself before the Lord among the sons of God; and in Zech. iii. 1, where he is standing in God's presence as an enemy of Joshua the high priest.

θνητοῖσιν φανείς, when asked who is the author of his punishment replies, βούλευμα μὲν τὸ Διον Ἡφαιστου δὲ χείρ [Prom. Vinc. 613, 619].

[1] Olshausen, Com. in Matt. x. 25.

[2] Lightfoot, Exercit. Matt. xii. 24.

There are also two passages in the Apocrypha the authors of which appear to have been conscious of the personality of the spirit of evil, "and the Devil shall smell it and flee away, and never come again any more" [Tobit vi. 17], and "nevertheless through envy of the Devil death came into the world" [Wisd. ii. 24]. The reason of this imperfect revelation of the character of Satan under the old dispensation is unknown to us; but it has been conjectured, from the proneness exhibited by the Israelites to the sin of idolatry, that it was a merciful provision on God's part to save them from paying worship to so powerful a spirit, and to preserve them from any à priori tendency to the dualistic theory of the Persian mythology, with which they came in long and close contact after the Captivity.

Quite the contrary is the case in the New Testament, where the hostility of a personal Satan to the work of Christ's redemption is everywhere plainly set forth, from the opening scene of the Temptation in the wilderness, to the final defeat of the devil foretold in the Book of Revelation. It is needless to enumerate passages in support of this assertion, or to make more than a passing allusion to the suggestion of modern times [Renan, Vie de Jesus, chap. xv.], that such language is only an accommodation on our Lord's part to popular phraseology or existing superstition. If words are to retain any meaning at all, how could personality be more vividly expressed than in the account of the Temptation [Matt. iv. 1-11.], or in our Lord's reproach to the Jews? [John viii. 44.] Satan appears at this period to have been allowed extraordinary manifestations of his potency, that by victory over them our Lord's power might be further enhanced, and more generally attested.

The devil's personality then being admitted, the question arises: What was his origin? The deduction usually based on certain somewhat obscure passages in the New Testament is that he was a fallen archangel. Among such passages are the allusions to him as the prince of devils [Matt. xii. 24], prince of the power of the air [Eph. ii. 2], to the fire prepared for the devil and his angels [Matt. xxv. 41]. Other similar ones are those which refer to a revolt of certain angels in heaven. "For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment" [2 Peter ii. 4], "And the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, He hath reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day" [Jude 6]. There is, however, an evident prima facie difficulty in supposing Satan to be one of the fallen angels referred to in the two latter passages; because these spirits are represented as reserved in chains and darkness, while Satan is elsewhere spoken of as an active agent, walking about, as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour [1 Peter v. 8]. The popular and almost universally received tradition, with all the minutiæ of Satan's rebellion and defeat by Michael the Archangel, is still more void of scriptural authority. It is thus put into vivid words by Milton:—

> "The infernal Serpent; he it was, whose guile, > Stirr'd up with envy and revenge, deceived
> The mother of mankind; what time his pride
> Had cast him out from heaven, with all his host
> Of rebel angels; by whose aid, aspiring
> To set himself in glory above his peers,
> He trusted to have equall'd the Most High,
> If he opposed; and, with ambitious aim
> Against the throne and monarchy of God,
> Raised impious war in heaven, and battle proud,
> With vain attempt. Him the Almighty Power
> Hurl'd headlong flaming from the ethereal sky,
> With hideous ruin and combustion, down
> To bottomless perdition; there to dwell
> In adamantine chains and penal fire,
> Who durst defy the Omnipotent to arms."
> —Par. Lost, 34-49.

This description is entirely based on Rev. xii. 7, 9, a passage which cannot refer to Satan's original rebellion, because the event takes place after the sounding of the seventh trumpet, and because his fall from the position which he appears hitherto to have held as accuser of mankind in heaven [Rev. xii. 10; Job i. ii.] is connected with the work of Christ's redemption; as seems to be implied in our Lord's own words, "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven" [Luke x. 18], and "Now is the judgment of this world, now shall the prince of this world be cast out" [John xii. 31]. Without, therefore, laying too great stress on the above difficult passages of Holy Scripture, we might still form the following conclusions with reference to the point under discussion. That Satan is a spirit or angel; that, beyond this, his original position was that of archangel or prince in the heavenly hierarchy: that although no record survives of his actual fall, yet it seems to have been caused by a rebellion against God, and that the cause of that rebellion was lust of power. The last particular is implied by the Apostle when, warning Christians against pride, he adds, "lest they fall into the condemnation of the devil" [1 Tim. iii. 6].

III. The Nature and Attributes of Satan. But however closely the veil is drawn in Holy Scripture over the details of Satan's origin and history—a fuller knowledge of which would at the best rather satisfy our curiosity than influence our conduct,—full particulars are vouchsafed to us of his nature and attributes. Among the prominent attributes of the Satanic character are, [a] hatred, which especially distinguishes the children of the devil from the true followers of Christ [1 John iii. 10]; and hence [b] murder [John viii. 44], which is hatred put into action, the first murderer Cain being designated as belonging to that wicked one who was a murderer and a liar from the beginning [John iii. 12], that is "filius non Dei sed diaboli, non generatione sed imitatione et suggestione."[1] [c] Falsehood; so ingrained is this quality in Satan's character that, "when he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own, for he is a liar, and the father of it" [John viii. 44]. [d] Impurity; "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do"

[1] Corn. à Lap. in 1 Jan. iii. 12.

[ibid.]. We may compare also the frequent reference made to unclean spirits, subordinate to Satan as their chief [Matt. xi.; Mark i. 27, &c.]. [e] Pride, as evinced in the account of the temptation, and as especially predicated of the devil by St. Paul in 1 Tim. iii. 6: [f] wiliness; the same Apostle fears for the Corinthians, "lest that by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so their minds should be corrupted from the simplicity which is in Christ" [2 Cor. xi. 3]. Such is the depth of his cunning that Christians are recommended to put on the whole armour of God, that they may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil [Eph. vi. 11]. Further allusions to it are found in 1 Tim. iii. 7; 2 Tim. ii. 26, and this wiliness shews itself in artifices such as slander, whence his name διάβολος, and in the transformations which he is enabled to assume,—"no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light" [2 Cor. xi. 14]. It was a serpent that tempted Eve [Gen. iii.]; through an old prophet that he misled the man of God [1 Kings xiii.]; as a lying spirit in the mouth of the prophets that he persuaded Ahab to go up to Ramoth-Gilead to battle [1 Kings xxii. 22]. Amongst all these characteristics of Satan there stand out clearly hatred, impurity, and falsehood, the exact contraries of those three great moral attributes which find their fullest perfection in Almighty God, love, purity, and truth.

IV. Satan's Power and Mode of Action. Satan's power is chiefly over the souls of men. He exercises it through a subtle and impalpable influence to do evil, more difficult to combat than any material form which old legends have represented him as assuming, "for we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places" [Eph. vi. 12]. But while Christ was on earth, and during the subsequent early years of Christianity, Satan was able to exercise power over the bodies as well as the souls of men [Demoniacal Possession], and on the other hand the Apostles appear to have possessed an extraordinary power of delivering sinners, body and soul, over into Satan's hands. Such at least is the literal interpretation of St. Paul's threat to deliver the incestuous Corinthian unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord [1 Cor. v. 5]; as also of his sentence on Hymenæus and Alexander, whom he delivered unto Satan that they might learn not to blaspheme [1 Tim. i. 20]. This literal interpretation has the unanimous support of the Greek Fathers, and of St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, and others among the Latin. Modern commentators, Bishop Beveridge, Estius, &c., incline to the view that "delivering to Satan" is only another title for excommunication and the consequent spiritual effects; that is, the punishment of the soul, and not of the body. In support of the latter view reference is made to Rev. ii. 9, iii. 9, where the term "synagogue of Satan" is applied to those who claim to be, but are not really, Jews, who are without the true pale of Israel. Satan's power is said, moreover, to extend over death, inasmuch as it was through him that man fell and death entered into the world [Wisd. ii. 24], and so the Incarnation and Death of Christ are said by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews to have taken place that "through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" [Heb. ii. 14]. Great then as Satan's power and influence are, Christ by His power has rendered them not invincible. The primeval promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head [Gen. iii. 15] has been fulfilled. "God," says St. Paul, "shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" [Rom. xvi. 20]. The Christian has the assurance that if he resist the devil he will flee from him [James iv. 7], and that if he keep himself as one that is begotten of God, that wicked one toucheth him not [1 John v. 18]. Lastly, the devil's mode of exercising his influence is various in itself, and in the means or instruments adopted. Sometimes it is portrayed as negative, or destructive of good already existing, as in the parable of the sower and the seed [Matt. xiii. 19], sometimes as positive, as in the parable of the tares [Matt. xiii. 39]. Before the Christian era divination was carried on by direct and open contact with Satan. It, too, assumed various forms, communications being sometimes effected by idols or oracles, as at Delphi: sometimes by means of spectres, as in the case of the witch of Endor [1 Sam. xxviii.], sometimes by the skull or other portion of a victim or corpse [κρανιομαντεῖα, necromancy, &c.]. Under the Christian dispensation, also, Satan's influence is often exercised through the medium of persons or things; either through those bad angels who are mentioned as incurring the same doom as their master [Matt. xxv. 41], or through bad men; for those who do evil become his children and obey his will and imitate his example in corrupting others. "Therefore it is no great wonder if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness, whose end shall be according to their works" [2 Cor. xi. 15]. Sometimes also through material agencies and inanimate instruments. Just as we find in the Old Testament the pestilence [2 Sam. xxiv. 16], or the sword, employed [2 Kings xix. 35] by good angels, working out the providence of God, so in the New Testament the infirmity under which a certain woman had laboured for eighteen years [Luke xiii. 16], and the thorn in the flesh from which St. Paul suffered [2 Cor. xii. 7] are mentioned as being the direct work of Satan.

But whether it be by physical infirmity or by spiritual weakness, whether through the medium of fallen man or evil spirit, one fact stands out clearly revealed in Holy Writ, that none can escape wholly from the assaults of Satan: that he remains the tempter of man, and the adversary of God, until the time comes when at the end of the world he and his angels shall be cast for ever into the lake of fire. [Evil, Demoniacal Possession.]

SATISFACTION. This is a term of Roman law, first adopted into Theology by St. Anselm to designate our Lord's work in giving Himself as a ransom for sinners; and in doing away with sin as an offence against God.

For repentance can never have any efficacy in itself to reverse the Divine decree, "the soul that sinneth it shall die;" and God's method of restoring fallen man to the glory of the likeness in which he was created was revealed from the beginning. It was promised that the seed of the woman should bruise the head, the seat of life and intelligence, in the principle of evil, though he who should effect this should be bruised in the heel, the lower fleshly nature in the contest. That is, in the fulness of time, a Saviour should be born of the seed of the woman, Who by His death should bring in the scheme ordained from all eternity, whereby God's justice is satisfied, man's sin is pardoned, and man himself raised once more to the full glory of his original birthright in the likeness of God.

This merciful purpose having been revealed, some perpetual memorial was needed, some institution of ceaseless operation that should keep the revelation alive in the hearts of men until the day of the Saviour's appearing; an institution that should harmonize thoroughly with what that Saviour should be and what He should do for man's salvation, and point with all demonstrative earnestness to the Saviour of mankind foreordained for that purpose in the merciful counsels of the Most High.

That institution was animal sacrifice. The pouring forth of blood, which is life, should prefigure Him who should reverse the decree of death, and restore to man hope of that life of glory that he had forfeited.

We have reason to believe that in the earliest ages truths were communicated to man, and the will of God made known to him by revelation, of which the extreme conciseness of the Scripture narrative takes no notice; that these were retained at first in their purity as traditions of Paradise, though in course of time they were debased and at last wholly obscured by superstition, as the race of man spread over the face of the earth, and was broken up into distinct stocks or families.

The existence of such primeval revelation is indicated in the sacrifice of Abel, who "by faith offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain" [πλείονα θυσίαν, Heb. xi. 4, "a much more sacrifice," Wycliffe]. Since he offered in faith, some manifestation of God's will must have preceded the object of that faith.

The distinction drawn between the offering of the two brothers declares its nature. Cain "brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the Lord," but Abel "brought of the firstlings of the flock, and of the fat thereof" [Gen. iv. 3, 4]. The nature of his offering constituted it "a more excellent sacrifice," for although the thank-offering of Cain was in a certain sense a sacrifice as being dedicated to God, yet Abel's oblation was a sacrifice in a far higher sense, as showing faith in the ordinance of God, whereby, from the beginning, the assurance of pardoned sin was connected with the shedding of blood. The offering of Cain was defective as not having this element, and the remedy for the defect is indicated in the reproof, "if thou doest well shalt thou not be accepted, and if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door" [Gen. iv. 7]. For the verb "lieth" is the word used in Hebrew only for the recumbent or crouching position of a quadruped, and "sin," its subject, is as correctly used in the original for "sin-offering" as simply for "sin." Its connection with the idea of crouching or lying down as a beast, fixes upon it in this passage the meaning of "sin-offering." Hence the verse may be thus paraphrased, "If thou doest not well, thy sin requireth expiation; follow the faithful example of thy brother, a victim is always ready to thine hand, and without blood there is no remission of sin."

We may observe also that animal food was not used by man till after the Flood; from whence then were the skins obtained that gave to man his clothing from the Fall [Gen. iii. 21], unless they were the exuviæ of beasts slain in sacrifice, and consumed as whole burnt sacrifices, as we believe to have been the case with Abel's "more excellent sacrifice." For the same reason this sacrifice involved no such idea of federal feasting with the deity, as became a common notion in after ages, for the victim could have furnished forth no feast at the very gates of paradise. Similarly the idea of the victim being a gift or free-will offering to the Deity is inapplicable, because the death of a victim for such a purpose, if in no way typical, would have been a mere act of cruelty, and it was too early in the history of the human race for the ordinary interchange of gifts to have made the idea sufficiently familiar to pass into an act of high religious worship. By a process of elimination, therefore, we come back to the idea with which we started, that the life of sacrificial victims was taken, from the very Fall, as an act of Divine institution, intended to prepare men for the display of God's marvellous scheme of mercy, a mystery in due time to be revealed, the death of the eternal Son upon the Cross for us men and for our salvation.

After the offering of Cain we read of no other oblation of the fruits of the earth until the giving of the Law. The patriarchal sacrifice was the burnt offering involving the death of a victim [Gen. viii. 20, xv. 17, xxii.; Exod. x. 25, xviii. 12; Job i. 5, xlii. 7, 8; Numb. xxiii. 2]. The sacrifices of the law demanded daily shedding of blood, as the Talmud says of the paschal scene in the outer court of the Temple, "it was the glory of the priests to wade knee deep in blood" [Pesach. Tos., iv. 7]. The sacrificial idea of the law was expressly that of an atonement, the offering of one life as a ransom for another. "The life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you upon the altar to make satisfaction for your souls; for it is the blood (the life) that maketh atonement for the soul (the life)" [Lev xvii. 11], and so throughout, "The legal sacrifices were allusions to the great and final atonement to be made by the blood of Christ, and not these an allusion to those" [Butler's Anal. 409]. It is impossible to follow this subject into matters of detail, only the reader may note the close parallel that subsisted between the typical sacrifice of the day of atonement, and its Antitype on Mount Calvary [Lev. xvi. 5-22]. This rite spoke clearly of the transfer, by imputation, of the sins of a whole people to the charge of the victim. The entire sacrifice consisted of the death of two victims, whose blood was the satisfaction for sin; and that it might be clearly known that the sacrifice conveyed the sure hope of sin pardoned and done away, confession was made by the atoning priest of the iniquities of the people over the head of a third living animal—the scapegoat, and being transferred to it by the solemn imposition of hands, they were sent with the animal into the wilderness to be no more remembered. What clearer type could have been given of the satisfaction made by Him on Whom "The Lord hath laid the iniquities of us all?" [Isa. liii. 6.]

The heathen sacrifices also from their universality can only be referred to one common origin, the point from whence all diverged from the traditions of Paradise into many a devious line of superstition, "when the nations deifying every passion of the human heart, and erecting altars to every vice, poured forth the blood of the victim, to deprecate the wrath or satiate the vengeance of each offended deity" [Magee on the Atonement, i. 54, London 1832]. Referring these propitiatory rites back to their origin, and viewing their universality, it is difficult to say whether they speak more clearly of the original unity of the human race, or of one general starting-point from a primeval faith in the atonement. "Sacrifices of expiation were commanded to the Jews and obtained among most other nations from tradition, whose origin was most probably revelation" [Butler's Anal. p. 413, Glasg. 1827].

The key to this whole sacrificial notion, with which the religious conscience of man had been so completely ingrained, is to be found only in the vicarious death of Christ for man's sin. The merciful scheme that this sacrifice should fully reveal had been ordained from all eternity. Christ was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. The necessity for Satisfaction was introduced by the Fall, and a forecasting faith in that mystery so full of awe was kept alive from the Fall to the day of Christ by the unceasing flow of sacrificial blood, "connecting in one view the two great cardinal events in the history of man—the fall and the recovery, the death denounced against sin, and the death appointed for that Holy One Who was to lay down His life to deliver man from the consequences of sin" [Magee, i. 51].

This doctrine of Satisfaction occupies a middle position in the system of Christian doctrines, between the Incarnation of the Eternal Son and man's sanctification through the Spirit. The Incarnation sets forth the voluntary self-abasement of the Son of God in taking upon Him man's nature; the Atonement, as its correlative, involves the deep humiliation of the Human Nature of Christ, when He suffered a death of shame and agony and utter desertion such as only the vilest criminals were made to suffer. No Christian man has ever endured the bitter pangs of shame and suffering, whether guilty or innocent, without the certainty that a deeper woe was endured by Him in Whom was no sin, and Who trod alone the winepress of the Divine wrath. "Behold and see whether there be any sorrow like unto My sorrow, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted Me in the day of His fieree anger" [Lam. i. 12].

Satisfaction stands also in closest relation with man's sanctification, because the gift of God's Holy Spirit is connected with it in the way of direct sequence. The close union between the Crucified and His people was cemented by the Blood of Christ that cleanseth from all sin. Oneness of will between Christ and God was declared by His voluntary submission to a death of suffering, and man's restoration to the power of doing anything according to God's will was brought about by the same sacrifice. It was necessary that He should depart that the Comforter might come, but the death of the Cross was the ordained mode of that decease. "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me; this He said signifying what death He should die" [John xii. 32]. Millions of redeemed souls have been led to glory by that death, and the words of the prophet have been accomplished, "When Thou shalt make His soul an offering for sin, He shall see His seed, He shall prolong His days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in His hand" [Isa. liii. 10].

The length to which this article has now extended makes it impossible to consider the Deist's and Unitarian's objections, which the reader will find fully answered by Magee, p. 21, and, from analogy, by Butler, pt. II. c. v. sec. 7. For Satisfaction in a penitential sense see PENANCE.

SCEPTICISM. The secondary meaning of σκέψις has been used from the time of Pyrrho [B.C. 375-285], to designate that extreme school of thought of which the first principle is that the opposite of every proposition is possible. Positive truth being thus unattainable, scepticism, or suspension of judgment, is put forth as the highest intellectual attitude which is possible for mankind; sceptical apathy being considered the highest practical form of life. Pyrrhonism was much modified in the course of its contact and conflict with the Stoics and the Platonists, but always adhered, theoretically, to its original principle, "We can know nothing, not even this itself, that we know nothing."

The modern revival of Scepticism as a system is traceable to the French "men of letters" who assisted so much to distinguish the reign of Louis XIV. In the year 1688 Le Vasser wrote: "People only speak of reason, good taste, the force of intellect, of the advantage of those who put themselves above the prejudices of education, and of the society in which they were born. Pyrrhonism is now the fashion above everything else.

People think that the legitimate exercise of the mind consists in not believing rashly, and in knowing how to doubt many things" [Hurst's Hist. of Rationalism, p. 103, ed. 1867]. But, however such a theoretical principle as this might suit the minds of fashionable Epicureans, it is clear that strong thinkers would look upon its universal application as a reductio ad absurdum, and later Scepticism has never followed Pyrrho into the amazing depth of nonsense which his first principle involves, but has taken the forms of English DEISM, German RATIONALISM, or French POSITIVISM, the latter being the nearest approach that has been made to a system of universal doubt and disbelief like that of Pyrrho. So much has this been the case that the term "Scepticism" is used in our own day as a designation of the less extreme forms of unbelief, and with a much nearer approach to its primary meaning, that of a suspension of judgment until it can be given on evidence which is satisfactory to the person judging.

Such a suspension of judgment is, to a certain extent, the mental attitude of every intellectual inquirer. [DOUBT.] But many facts and truths are based upon evidence which cannot be sifted by every intellectual inquirer, seeing that it is impossible for every such person to qualify himself for sifting evidence which deals with every branch of knowledge. Hence a suspension of judgment is often practically unreasonable when opportunity has been wanting for personal inquiry into the subject to be judged about. Testimony is an evidence in itself [FAITH], and personal inquiry or reasoning (even when the inquirer or reasoner is of the highest intellectual order of mind) often adds nothing to the evidence which it affords, though it may give confidence in the reception of what it alleges.

But Scepticism often arises [1] from want of diligence in the examination of evidence, or [2] from a deficiency in the judicial faculty by which the value and bearing of evidence is to be determined. The only form of it which is found in minds of a high order is that judicial hesitation which refuses to give a full intellectual assent to any truth except on fair evidence of research, reasoning, or testimony. Such a form of Scepticism is the true ally of Faith, and the constant foe of superstition.

SCHISM. Schism is a wilful breach of the outward unity of the Church.[1] To understand fully the nature of schism we must consider the organization of the Church, the unity of the Church, and the acts in which that unity is expressed.

In the organization of the Church the integral elements are its bishopries. There is no need to consider extraordinary cases—in the normal state of the Church each diocese is complete in itself as regards all that is essential to the Christian life; nor without a bishop would a society have those essentials. But a single bishopric has not the power of continuing itself. A union of bishoprics is required to constitute a full formed Church.

Now the New Testament history shews that there may be, or rather that it is God's will there shall be, many such unions of bishops, limited and defined by natural bonds of race, or by civil bonds of temporal governments. There is no intimation whatever in Scripture of a union under one earthly head. The Apostles mention no such unity, they established no such polity, the churches of different countries are named as independent of each other, with a perfect liberty and full authority to govern their own members, to manage their own affairs, to decide controversies and causes among themselves without allowing appeals or rendering accounts to others. [See Rev. ii. iii.; 1 Cor. xiv. 40; 1 Thess. v. 14; 1 Cor. v. 12, vi. 1. Bramhall and Barrow.]

It has been debated whether in these unions of bishops the further office of metropolitan be jure divino. For the present purpose this matters little or nothing. The Episcopate being jure divino, obedience is due to the united body whether they meet in council under a temporary president, or whether their power be centred in a metropolitan. No metropolitan can be considered apart from his synod: his powers are all based on a collected Episcopate. The same may be said of the still higher office of Patriarch.

Each Church then retaining its autonomy and freedom, there is no one earthly head over all, and no power to which all are bound to submit, except the acknowledged decrees of Œcumenical Councils. The unity of the Church, which is primarily its incorporation into one mystical body of Christ, has many laws and acts of external communion. "External communion consists first in the same creeds, which are the ancient badges or cognizances of Christianity. Secondly, in the participation of the same sacraments. Thirdly, in the same external worship and frequent use of the same divine offices or liturgies or forms of serving God" (in which is a unity of essentials, though not necessarily a uniformity of type). "Fourthly, in the use of the same public rites and ceremonies. Fifthly, in giving communicatory letters from one church, or one person, to another. And lastly, in admission of the same discipline, and subjection to the same supreme authority, that is Episcopacy, or a General Council: for as single bishops are the heads of particular churches, so Episcopacy, that is a General Council, or Œcumenical assembly of bishops, is the head of the Universal Church." [Bramhall, Vindication of the Church of England, Works, 1676, p. 57.]

Separations, then, may be made by single men, by bishops involving their dioceses in the separation, or by whole churches. They may be from the Church at large, or only from a particular church. Breaches of any one, or of several together, or of all together, of the laws of outward union may be made; and out of these numerous and diversified acts, which is to be accounted schism, a rending of the body of Christ?

[1] From this primary conception, it will be noticed that internal dissensions which do not issue in separation of communion, are not schism. They are sins of another kind. Also that where there is separation of communion the separated is not necessarily the schismatic. Diotrephes was clearly the schismatic, not they whom he cast out of the Church.

First. One man may commit an act of schism. Although not an integral element in the organization of the body (as we described bishopries to be), he is a member of the body, and his separation from it may be formally schism.

Secondly. Separations may be from a particular church, or of one church from another church, without involving a separation from the Church Catholic. There may be a fissure in the superstructure of the temple while yet both parts still rest on the foundation. Two churches refusing each other's communion, but both endeavouring to maintain communion with the rest of the Church, and both appealing to the decision of a general council, are so situated.

Thirdly. To constitute a formal act of schism, the law broken must be one of those which are essential to unity. Some of the constituent parts of external communion, as described above, such as the giving of commendatory letters, the practising the same rites and ceremonies, are not essential. The omission of these may be a cessation of a part of fraternal intercourse, or a neglect of subordinate means of unity, but can hardly amount to a breach of unity. The essentials of unity are, the same creed, valid orders, and valid sacraments. The first of these three differs from the other two in this, that its denial is not directly, but by consequence, a breach of unity. A heretic is to be rejected after the first and second admonition. The schism follows upon the heresy: but the denial of lawful authority and the rejection of communion are the schism itself. To these two, therefore, we must look in describing acts of schism. For the former of these, our fellowship with Christ is through fellowship with the Apostles [1 John i. 3], and our fellowship with the Apostles can only be through fellowship with them who have succeeded to the Apostolic commission. This fellowship shows itself in obedience [1 Cor. xi. 1]. For the latter, it is sufficient to refer to the One Bread and One Body of 1 Cor. x. 17, and for our Lord's prayer for unity before He sanctified Himself.

All these considerations are to be combined in determining what acts are acts of schism.

A man is in schism who without sufficient cause deliberately renounces either the pastoral authority under which he is placed, or the Eucharist as celebrated in the church to which he belongs.

A bishop with his diocese is in schism when he and they so renounce the authority of the provincial council or the Eucharist of their church.

A church is in schism which so renounces the authority of councils œcumenically accepted, or the Eucharist of sister churches.

In all cases of separation there may be sufficient cause, and the position of appellants is to be fully recognised in estimating the state of those who are in separation. In all cases also the schism may be partial, not entire, a separation of a part from a part, not of a part from the whole.

The special sin of schism is its wilful and formal opposition to charity. Charity is the bond of union and the life of Christian obedience. Both the severance of union and the renunciation of obedience directly assail the prime grace of Christianity. Entire and perfected schism is tantamount to apostasy, if not identical with it. To produce such a state it would seem to be necessary that the schismatic should not only have altogether renounced the communion of the whole Church, but that he should have been met also by a valid excommunication, ratifying on the part of the Church his own voluntary act. Such an one is cut off from Christ. But it is seldom that schism has proceeded to this extremity. The more common state is that of partial schism. Nor does even every valid excommunication produce an entire separation. To have this effect it must be formally accepted and ratified by the whole Church. Of partial schism Hooker writes, after having named apostasy as that which cuts off clean from the visible Church of Christ, "Schismatics as touching the quarrels for which, or the duties wherein, they divide themselves from their brethren . . . . have forsaken the Church that keepeth the bond of unity which they violate, this very true Church of Christ they have left, howbeit not altogether left nor forsaken simply the Church, upon the main foundations whereof they continue built, notwithstanding these breaches whereby they are rent at the top asunder" [Ecc. Pol. V. lxviii. 6]. And of these it may be said without hesitation, as St. T. Aquinas decides in general, "Quanquam schismatici habere ordinis potestatem possint, jurisdictionis tamen auctoritate privantur" [Aquin. Sec. Sec. qu. xxxix. art. iii.]

SCHOLASTIC THEOLOGY. [Theology, Scholastic.]

SCOTIST. [Theology, Scholastic.]

SCRIPTURE. The written word of God. "The Lord said unto Moses, Write (Hebr. כתב) this for a memorial in a book" [Ex. xvii. 14]; "All these things are . . . written (ἐγράφη) for our admonition" [1 Cor. x. 11]. Hence the titles ἡ γραφή [John ii. 22]; αἱ γραφαί [Matt. xxii. 29]; γραφαὶ ἁγίαι [Rom. i. 2]; ἱερὰ γράμματα [2 Tim. iii. 15]; and hence the mode of quoting the Word of God—γέγραπται [Matt. iv. 4]—scriptum est. [See Bible, Testament, Canon.]

SEASONS, CANONICAL. [Year.]

SECOND ADVENT. It seems to have been the will of our Lord that the idea of His return to earth should have a conspicuous place in the spiritual and intellectual life of Christians. The closing pages of the Canon of Holy Scripture are chiefly occupied with a mystical prophecy respecting it: the Epistles of St. Peter and St. Paul contain many references to it; and in the Gospels there are parables and prophecies spoken by Christ Himself which deal with the subject as one of the highest importance to the Church. So much, indeed, did it enter into the minds of His immediate disciples that the characteristic moral aspect of the early Church was that of a community, "waiting for the coming of the Lord;" a community in whose ears were ringing constantly the words spoken by angels at the Ascension, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner, as ye have seen Him go into heaven" [Acts i. 11].

The most direct, and what may be justly called the primary, revelation given to us respecting this second advent proceeded from our Lord's own lips. Having ended His personal work of evangelization, He wound up His solemn warnings to the Jews with the words, "Behold your house is left unto you desolate, for I say unto you, Ye shall not see Me henceforth till ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the Name of the Lord" [Matt. xxiii. 38], the very words which had rung out from the lips of the multitude a few days before, when they led Him triumphantly to the Temple. After this, as He was leaving the city, His disciples drew His attention to the buildings of the Temple, the "goodly stones" of which had been piled up with skill that anticipated modern triumphs of architectural engineering, which led to His saying, "There shall not be left here one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down" [Matt. xxiv. 2]. This reduplication of such stern words evidently made a greater impression than usual upon the Apostles. It seemed, and not unreasonably, that the destruction of the Temple must usher in the very end of the world itself, and that it must be to that time Christ was referring when He declared that He would come again to be received with a glad welcome. "Tell us," they therefore said to Him privately, "when shall these things be? And what shall be the sign of Thy Coming, and of the end of the world?" [Matt. xxiv. 3]. It was in answer to these three questions that our Lord uttered those prophecies and parables which extend through the 24th and 25th chapters of St. Matthew's Gospel, and are given in a more condensed form by St. Mark and St. Luke. And what these told respecting the Second Advent was supplemented by His words before the judgment seat of the High Priest, "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven" [Matt. xxvi. 64]. It is not surprising, therefore, that the early Church dwelt much upon the idea of a Second Advent. The words of our Lord seemed left as a parting gift of promise and warning; they were emphasized by the declaration of the angels at His final removal from their sight; taken up in the inspired writings of Apostles; and repeated to the Church two generations after they had been first uttered in the striking form, "Surely I come quickly" [Rev. xxii. 20], as the very last words that men were to hear of Him Who spake them.

The prediction of a Second Advent was, therefore, firmly and plainly impressed upon the mind of the Church from its beginning, and that in such a manner, and with such frequent reiteration as to shut out all reasonable hypotheses of metaphor. It was a prediction of a true and real coming of our Lord God Incarnate a second time to earth at a time far distant according to human reckoning, but "quickly" in the perpetual present of the Eternal mind.

Second Advent

Respecting the circumstances of that Second Advent, the purposes for which Christ will again come, and the events which will precede the accomplishment of those purposes, we are not left wholly uninformed. It is evident that it will be preceded by certain signs which will conspicuously mark out the time of its approach, that the manner of it will be such as to proclaim the supreme glory of God Incarnate, and that the object of it will be triumphantly accomplished. Each of these may be followed up in some detail by the light of the New Testament, and chiefly of our Lord's own words.

I. Signs Preceding the Second Advent. The answer which our Lord gave to the question "What shall be the sign of Thy coming, and of the end of the world," contains the prediction of three classes of events. [1.] There will be an age of tribulation, an age in which disturbances of the physical order of the world, political commotions and wars, and social disorganization will involve the whole material and moral world in their effects. [2.] In the midst of these universal sorrows, and by means of them, the Church will pass through a time of special preparation for the presence of our Lord. This will be partly by the trial of faith, partly by the general presentation of the Gospel to all nations as a final offer of salvation. [3.] There will also be a sifting out of Christ's true servants by means of a great persecution, which will end in the apostasy of many under the leadership of a personal Antichrist.

[1.] The age of tribulation. This series of events is marked out by our Lord in the words, "Then shall be great tribulation, such as was not from the beginning of the world to this time, no nor ever shall be" [Matt. xxiv. 23]; words which are almost identical with those of the prophet Daniel, "There shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time" [Dan. xii. 1]. This age of sorrow and trouble seems as if it would precede the Second Advent by a considerable space of time. Our Lord calls it "the beginning of sorrows," and says that "the end is not yet" [Matt. xxiv. 8]. No doubt it is a mistake to map out with much minuteness the chronology of any prophetic period which is yet future; and all that can be said of this is that the "beginning" and the "end" point to a series of years or generations during which there will be time for mankind at large to gain some new and terrible experiences. "Ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars . . . nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; and there shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes, in divers places" [Matt. xxiv. 6, 7]. Such typical disturbances of the moral and material world represent the deepest and most wide-spread intensity of human sufferings; confidence between man and man broken down; the ordinary business of the world interrupted by ambitions and quarrels; mighty physical convulsions shaking the foundations of the earth; life itself made burdensome by hunger, thirst, and disease.

No rational Christian can venture to say that there is any improbability in the picture which a literal interpretation of our Lord's words thus pourtrays. Such things as He predicts are, in their degree, matters of experience; and every now and then we are warned that in spite of civilization wars have not ceased, that political economy has not banished famine and drought, and that sanitary science has not abolished disease. The experiences of a scientific age, therefore, are near enough of kin to those of other ages to shew that the development of existing tribulation is all that is required for the realization of the horrors predicted as the "great tribulation." As miracles are an intensification of natural processes, so it wants but an intensification of the natural forces which are ever latent around us to produce the most literal fulfilment of all that is thus predicted by our Lord. And if we ask why should all this happen? then perhaps we may come nearest to the true answer by looking back to the analogy of God's past Providence, when He suffered the waters of the Deluge to pour forth that out of the midst of them the moral and the physical world might arise regenerated. So, perhaps, the breaking up of the existing face of things by human violence and Divine judgment will be for the purpose of re-establishing the human race and its dwelling-place in the vigour and freshness of a new life: the storm, and the frost, and the plough breaking up the exhausted soil and preparing for the new birth of an everlasting spring. [New Creation.]

Second Advent

[2.] The Preparation of the Church. The second class of events which our Lord predicted is that by means of which the Church will be prepared for meeting Him as a Master coming for the account of His steward's work. It would be presumptuous as well as irrational to attempt any thing like an exact definition of the boundaries by which these classes of events are marked off from each other. We may, however, reasonably suppose that this age of preparation will be to a greater or lesser extent coincident with that of the great Tribulation, and that the circumstances of the world will be an element in the discipline of the Church.

It seems to be indicated to us by our Lord that the Second Advent will not occur until the Church has exhausted all her resources in the work of evangelization. "And this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come" [Matt. xxiv. 14]. These words refer, no doubt, in the first instance, to that Apostolic preaching whose sound went forth into all the earth and its words unto the end of the world" [Rom. x. 18]. So probably we must interpret some other words of our Lord. "Verily I say unto you, Ye shall not have gone over all the cities of Israel until the Son of Man be come." In both cases we must remember the double sense of prophecy, and understand that [1] all Jews of that generation were to have the witness of the Gospel placed before them for acceptance or rejection before the Son of Man came in judgment to their city and nation: [2] and that the witness of the Gospel was to be extended to all other nations and generations until the Second Coming of Christ and the end of all things.

And if we look back upon the history of the Church, we shall find that, except in the first age, there is little trace of any such extraordinary spread of the Gospel as would seem to satisfy the full force of our Lord's words. In Apostolic times the Gospel was literally preached to "nations," and whole peoples would be converted at once under the leadership of their rulers, or by the power of a suddenly and mysteriously spread conviction. Since those ages the witness of the Gospel has been carried among the heathen without gaining a converting influence over any large numbers at once, and without leading to any strikingly sudden results. But we may gather from our Lord's words, taken as a twofold prophecy, that when "the end" is approaching, they who then live will see the Church as "another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to Him, for the hour of His judgment is come: and worship Him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters" [Rev. xiv. 6, 7]. Then the Gospel will be preached to great nations like those of China, Japan, India, and Africa, in a manner far more effective than that of any previous missionary work: and the people that have so long sat in darkness will see something more than the rays of a distant light, something more than a Gospel which they know only as another religion than their own. Then these nations will behold the all-penetrating rays of a noonday Gospel shining upon them with a Light from which there is no hiding. The Church will go among the heathen with the banners of Christ's Cross boldly confronting the banners of idolatry, Mahometanism, or atheistic philosophy. The missionaries of the Gospel will shew the Church of their Divine Master to the heathen in all her external and internal beauty. There will be no compromise of her Truth, no veiling of her rites through fear and weak-heartedness. There will be no shrinking from that full proclamation of Christ and His Sacramental work which will be a complete witness of "the everlasting Gospel."

The history of past ages and the experience of modern times teaches us that no such proclamation of Christ among the millions of China, India, Japan, and Africa, can ever take place without some renewed and special development of the gifts of the Spirit. The missionaries of the Roman Propaganda and of our own great Societies have done what they could, and their zeal has not gone unrewarded. But the harvest-fields contain hundreds of millions of souls, and the labourers are but a few hundred: the supernatural power of the Evil one is the great support of most of the false religions of the world, and this has to be met at present by the ordinary powers only of the priesthood and the episcopate. Those who look closely at the history of Christian missions will soon come to believe that while we are bound to do all the work we can with our present means, it must be by means of a more directly supernatural kind that God will eventually send forth His Church to make a final and universal proclamation of the everlasting Gospel.

Some look for this supernatural converting power of the Church in a revival of the miraculous powers by means of which the Apostles first converted the world. Others look for it in the fulfilment of a prophecy of Malachi, "I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord" [Mal. iv. 5]; to which also they refer the preaching of the two witnesses spoken of in the Book of Revelation.

That Elijah is associated in some special manner with the Person and work of our Lord is strongly suggested by his presence at the Transfiguration with Moses. The prophecy of Malachi is partly satisfied by the ministry of St. John the Baptist: but "the great and dreadful day of the Lord" may well be supposed to refer to the Second Advent as well as the first. When St. John the Baptist was asked, "Art thou Elias? he answered, No." And when the question was asked of our Lord by the disciples, "Why then say the scribes that Elias must first come?" it was only after our Lord had spoken of the future, "Elias truly shall first come, and restore all things," that He said also of the past, "But I say unto you, That Elias is come already, and they knew him not" [Matt. xvii. 11]. Although, therefore, St. John the Baptist did "go before the Lord in the spirit and power of Elias," according to the prophecy of the angel who predicted his birth, there is yet room to believe that the great and dreadful day of the Lord's second coming will be preceded by the ministration of Elijah himself, once taken alive into heaven, thence descending, it may be, as one of the two witnesses who shall be slain, and their blood poured forth in the midst of Jerusalem, and who are to prophesy a thousand two hundred and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth, as Elijah prophesied for the time of his former ministrations [Rev. xi. 3-12].

But in whatever way the Lord may accomplish this last mission work of the Church, it will doubtless result in the conversion of vast numbers to the faith of Christ; and among these multitudes of the Church's last harvest will be acted over again the scenes and trials of her first ingathering.

For that age of final preparation for Christ's Second Advent will undoubtedly be an age when Satan will once more desire to sift as wheat the servants of Christ: and there will be days of hot persecution that will cause many to go back, unable to endure the fiery trial to the end. Then once more Christians will have to confess Christ with their lives in their hands. "Then," says our Lord, "they shall deliver you up to be afflicted, and shall kill you: and ye shall be hated of all men for My Name's sake. And then shall many be offended, and betray one another, and shall hate one another. . . . And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold" [Matt. xxiv. 9, 10, 12]. Of such hardships and persecutions for the sake of Christ there is no sign to be seen as yet. All that we see which looks towards it is that there is an increase of energy on the part of the Church throughout the world, that probably indicates the approach of an age in which it will become more and more like the Church in her early days of fervent love, untiring zeal, and irresistible converting power. Such an increase of power, zeal, and love, is sure to arouse a corresponding energy on the part of the great enemy, and out of this the persecution may arise. And out of this persecution it is certain there will arise the final apostasy with which this dispensasion will close.

[3.] The great Apostasy. For a third sign of our Lord's Second Advent will be the appearance and temporary triumph of the great personal foe in whom all the opposition that has been offered to Christ and His kingdom will reach its climax. After what has been said elsewhere [ANTICHRIST] on the personality and leading characteristics of Antichrist, it is only necessary here to speak of that result of his success of which our Lord speaks, when He says, "Many false prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many. And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold" [Matt. xxiv. 11, 12]; and of which St. Paul also writes, that the Second Advent of Christ will not occur until "there come an apostasy first" [2 Thess. ii. 3].

The great object of Antichrist will be to set himself up as the object of men's worship instead of Christ: the great means by which the seduction of his worshippers is accomplished will be the supernatural power which he will be able to oppose to the supernatural power of Christ. His coming [παρουσία], says St. Paul, "is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders."[1] So our Lord had spoken of the false Christs who should shew great "signs and wonders." And as the Apostle declared that this supernatural power would be accompanied by "all deceivableness," so Christ had said, "insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." These are not words that infer, as some have supposed, extreme developments of mechanical and philosophical science, the results of which are so marvellous already that we sometimes almost lose sight of the fact that they arise from the discovery and the application of natural laws and forces. However marvellous these may be, and however miraculous they may falsely appear to the ignorant, they are brought about through the action of intellect and the powers of research; through the ordinary action, that is, of gifts bestowed on men by God, and not by any extraordinary power of working miracles. On the other hand, the "all power" (κατ' ενέργειαν τοῦ Σατανᾶ ἐν πάσῃ δυνάμει) with which Antichrist is said by St. Paul to come, carries us back to the recollection of the words spoken to our [1] The words here used by St. Paul are those which are used in the Gospels for the "working," the "power," the "signs and wonders," of Christ.

Lord by Satan at the Temptation; when, shewing to Christ all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, he added, "All this power [ἐξουσίαν ταύτην ἅπασαν] will I give Thee, and the glory of them; for that is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will I give it" [Luke iv. 4]. It thus seems that the supernatural power of working miracles will be accompanied by an universal authority or kingdom, won, perhaps, by means of them. Thus the opposition of Antichrist to Christ will consist in setting up a person instead of Him as the object of worship, in working miracles such as characterized Christ's First Advent, and in establishing an universal empire in the place of the Church.

The elements of seduction contained in such a power are sufficiently evident, and perhaps they will possess all the greater strength in proportion to the high developments of a civilization uninfluenced by love of God. Men will be attracted to become followers of Antichrist first by his accumulation of universal empire, reverencing in its extremest development [Rev. xiii. 4] that success which is said to be the most successful of all things. They will be attracted also by his supernatural power, the visible exercise of which subdues at once, and the merest shadow of which in the form of "spirit-rapping" has seduced multitudes in the present day in America and elsewhere. After the chains of such seductions have bound the minds and affections of mankind, they will easily be prevailed upon to take the last step in apostasy, "Fall down and worship me." Such, it seems, will be the course of the great apostasy, the last stage in the preparation for Christ's Second Advent.

II. The Manner of Christ's Coming. Such preceding "signs" as those thus indicated will prepare the few faithful who remain alive after the troubles and persecutions of those days for the immediate Advent of their Lord. Yet it is clear that His approach will be with a certain amount of unexpectedness [Mal. iii. 1], as was the case with His First Advent. The work of the world will be going on as usual; "as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall the coming of the Son of Man be" [Matt. xxiv. 37]. Yet this unpreparedness will be the result of sin and unbelief as it was in the case of the antediluvians. The exact time, indeed, can be known to none beforehand [Matt. xxiv. 36], yet the preceding signs will be such a witness to the world as the building of the Ark was, accompanied like it, probably, by the warning voice of a "preacher of righteousness" like Noah, the "two witnesses" of the Apocalypse to whom reference has already been made.

When, however, all such signs of the Lord's coming have run their course, the physical convulsions, the social disorganization, the wars, the wonders of Antichrist, the great falling away of Christians from Christ; there will then be a token of the approaching Presence which will be such as to convince unbelievers as well as believers. For the great tribulation and apostasy will end, our Lord declares, in a preternatural darkness and agitation of the heavens which will extend over the whole world, as the terrors of Sinai extended over the plain on which the Israelitish nation was gathered to await the Presence of Jehovah. "Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven." What is the means by which this will be brought about can only be known in its fulfilment, but our Lord's words point to unprecedented and universal phenomena of a nature similar to those which, on a small scale, attend earthquakes and volcanic eruptions, and which we also know to have attended the destruction of Pompeii and Herculaneum a few years after His Ascension. Those words are: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken" [Matt. xxiv. 29]. In the midst of which preternatural darkness there will burst forth in the sight of all that celestial Labarum which will herald the immediate approach of Christ. "Then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory" [Matt. xxiv. 30]. All will then see Christ's cross stretched forth in the midst of the darkness as the bright standard of the King of kings, and will at once know that it is set up as the token of His coming to reign in judgment.

There seems to be no room for doubt that the Person of Christ will then be made visible to all men. "All the tribes of the earth . . . shall see the Son of Man coming." "Behold He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him, and they also that pierced Him, and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him" [Rev. i. 7]. This may be effected by some vast gathering of nations to one district of the world (perhaps by the instrumentality of the previous depopulation and the universal reign of Antichrist), so that all can look simultaneously on their Lord in the air. Or it may be by some quick traversing of the whole world by Him Who has thus descended from heaven, so that the Person which was seen by a few only at His first coming may at His second be seen by all. "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven . . . before Him shall be gathered all nations" [Matt. xxv. 31].

These characteristics of Christ's Second Advent are strikingly illustrated by several of His parables, such as that of the Ten Virgins, and that of the man travelling into a far country after a long time to return and reckon with his servants for the use of the talents bestowed on them. But there is no more comprehensive illustration of the manner in which He will appear at that day than in His own words, "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be" [Matt. xxiv. 27]. By this image is pictured the splendour of that SHECHINAH of which St. Paul says "That wicked" shall be destroyed by the brightness of His coming. The light of the Son of God and the Son of Man coming forth from the light of the Father, coming suddenly, swiftly, irresistibly, an untold intensification of such a marvellous illumination as accompanies the flash of a summer storm. But though swift and sudden as lightning in its approach, the glory of the Second Advent will doubtless be present for some considerable time to the eyes of men, and not pass away like lightning, in an instant,—The "Word, quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword,"[1] going forth conquering and to conquer, and to take His kingdom to Himself.

It appears that this progress of the King of kings in His Second Advent will follow in that westward track which has marked the spread of all secular empire, and the extension of the Church. From the time when the children of Noah journeyed from the east and found a plain in the land of Shinar [Gen. xi. 1] to the last great emigration of the world's history, in which Europe sends its surplus populations to find a home beyond the Atlantic, the tendency of the world has ever been to thicken its populations in a westward direction. In the same direction has been the flux of empire, that of the Median, Assyrian, and Persian races, being succeeded by that of the Greek nations, the latter by Rome, and Rome by Western Europe, and Western Europe by the English race in America.[2] The kingdom of Christ has also travelled hitherto, generally speaking, in the same course. From the days when St. Peter set forth from Joppa, and St. Paul from Cæsarea, and when St. John left Jerusalem for Ephesus, until the comparatively recent days when the Church planted her feet firmly in the "new world," the greatest and the most enduring part of her mission work has followed the course of the sun.

It seems likely, therefore, that there is a literal meaning even in our Lord's words that the coming of the Son of Man shall be as the lightning coming from the east and shining even unto the west: and that this will be the direction in which the Sun of Righteousness, coming forth from His heavenly chamber, will "rejoice as a giant" to run His triumphant course.[3] It is an ancient opinion, founded on Zech. xiv. 4, that our Lord will first appear on earth in the place from which He ascended to heaven. We may, at least, believe that He will first appear as Judge in the same part of the world in which He appeared as Redeemer. Further, that going thence with a swift course of irresistible light and power He will follow up and destroy the universal empire of Antichrist, and bring all the world face to face with Himself. Thus in a new sense would be fulfilled the prophecy of Ezekiel, "And behold the glory of the Lord came from the way of the east, and His voice was like a noise of many waters, and the earth shined with His glory" [Ezek. iii. 2].

III. THE PURPOSE OF CHRIST'S SECOND ADVENT. We cannot fail to see that when our Lord thus returns to earth He will be surrounded by an army of saints and angels, and will display a glorious Majesty such as has never before been seen on earth. The work of His Incarnation began in retirement, humiliation, and sorrow; it will be perfected in the midst of a triumphant display of power and Divine Royalty: it began as a kingdom which came not "with observation;" it will be perfected as a kingdom which proclaims its irresistible supremacy in the sight of all creation.

Among the great works to be associated with this Supremacy of Christ at His second coming are the general Resurrection and the Last Judgment: as to both of which Holy Scripture gives out a note of no uncertain sound, though it leaves as an unrevealed mystery any detail of information as to the mode in which they are to be accomplished.

[1.] The general Resurrection is so set forth that every one may say with perfect confidence respecting any person who has died or will die, as Martha said of Lazarus, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day" [John xi. 24]. Even in the dim light of prophetic times there was the vision of a vast valley full of dry bones, among which as the word of the Lord went forth upon them "there was a noise, and, behold, a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to his bone," and they were clothed upon with sinew and flesh and skin, and the animating breath of God came from the four winds, and they lived and stood upon their feet an exceeding great army [Ezek. xxxvii. 1-10]. But when the Lord Himself arose from the dead the dim vision became an illuminated fact. His words had been fulfilled, "I am the Resurrection and the Life," and henceforth the resurrection of the body became an essential part of Christian doctrine. He drew aside for a moment the veil of the future, and the seer describes what he saw at the last in the words, "I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God . . . and the sea gave up the dead which were in it, and death and the grave delivered up the dead which were in them" [Rev. xx. 12, 13]. If we ask "how are the dead raised?" all the answer we can get is that they are so by the supreme power of Him Who created them, and that the Resurrection Body cannot be a more difficult work of creation than the natural body. [BODY, SPIRITUAL. NEW CREATION. RESURRECTION OF THE BODY.] But

[1] In association with the "Sign of the Son of Man," and the Coming "as lightning," it is observable that lightning has frequently been known to leave the mark of the Cross upon the persons and garments of those whom it has struck. Bishop Warburton gives some indubitable instances of this from the testimony of Isaac Casaubon, Bishop Andrewes, and others. [See Warburton's Julian, p. 119].

[2] It is striking also to observe that the decadence of the Roman Empire began when the seat of it was removed eastward from Rome to Constantinople, as if this was a rebellion against a fixed law.

[3] Since electric currents all, of necessity, pass from east to west, it is not unlikely that the course of lightning is subject to some law of the kind.

as to the fact of a general Resurrection it is especially associated by our Lord with His own Presence, "The hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear His voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation" [John v. 28, 29]. Death seems never to have been able to hold his own in the presence of "The Life" during His First Advent, even in His state of humiliation. At His second, His Presence in glory will carry with it the universal power which accompanied the individual "Come forth" uttered to Lazarus, and the burial antiphon of the Eastern Church will find its fullest meaning, "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof." That fulness of the earth which has gone on gathering as in a treasury for two hundred generations: they that have dwelt in the dust of the earth from the time of the first man who returned thither to that of the last who shall be the victim of death will then be poured forth, "some" to arise "to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt" [Dan. xii. 2].

[2.] For contemporary with the supreme miracle of the general Resurrection will be the supreme work of the universal last judgment. Whatever has been going on with the souls of men between death and resurrection [INTERMEDIATE STATE. PURGATORY], the great assize of the last day will bring a final sentence for good or for evil to every human soul and every human body that has ever existed. Hence our Lord's words just quoted from St. John's Gospel are supplemented by those of St. Paul, "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad" [2 Cor. v. 10].

The manner in which the Last Judgment will be effected is described chiefly in parable. Once our Lord speaks of it as a field in which the tares and the wheat which have grown up together are reaped and separated by the angels, the one to go into God's garner, the others into the fire which burns up useless weeds. Another time it is a king's marriage supper, from which the representative guest without a wedding-garment is bound hand and foot and cast out of the chamber of light and joy into the place of outer darkness. Again it is as ten virgins of whom five having their lights burning are admitted to the king's marriage chamber, while the five whose lamps have gone out are rejected. Or it is the adjudication of reward and punishment to those who have had the talents given to them for use and increase: or the flock of sheep and goats, where the one are set on the right hand, the others on the left. But in the Apocalyptic Vision prophetic language represents the reality in a way that shews how substantially literal even the language of parable is: "I saw a great white throne, and Him that sat on it, from Whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God: and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. . . . And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire" [Rev. xx. 12, 15]. Such language does not necessarily imply that there will be any protracted formality of individual trial by evidence. Our Lord's words in the parable, "out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant," and His other saying, "By thy words shalt thou be justified, and by thy words shalt thou be condemned," seem to point to an immediate self-conviction extending its bitter scrutiny to every moment of life, and if pleading excuses, "Lord when saw we Thee an hungred or athirst," or "Have we not preached in Thy Name, and in Thy Name cast out devils," pleading them against that self-conviction, with a vain hope of extenuation, but with a real sentence of condemnation already gone forth from the conscience.

There is still one great truth respecting which a few words must be said. The Son of God will come in His Second Advent with power and great glory, preceded by fearful signs, setting up the banner of judgment, surrounded by myriads of angels, only one of whom fully revealed to human sight would cause even a brave man to tremble. He will come with full authority to judge and power to punish, so that a word of His can decide the everlasting fate of all who will be gathered before His throne. But picture to ourselves as we will all the terrors of that awful Advent, and yet the great truth underlies them all, that He will come in His human nature, and that the banner of judgment will be that of the Cross of Mercy. They, therefore, who see the Throne of His Majesty, and the glory of the Omniscient Judge, will yet look upon the face of the Son of Man and the sign of His redeeming and saving work: upon Him Who even when He goes forth to subdue all things to Himself, and to judge the world, will go forth clad in garments which are dyed in the blood of His Passion.

SECULARIZATION. The application to secular or profane purposes of things originally devoted to religious uses. It is frequently used with a less general meaning to denote a lawful and authorized, as opposed to an unlawful or sacrilegious, application of sacred things to secular uses. [CONSECRATION. SACRILEGE.]

SEMI-ARIANISM. Semi-Arianism was a modification or rather a series of modifications of the Arian system. The Semi-Arian party had not one uniform definition of faith, but differed from each other on many important points: the only real bond of agreement was their opposition to the term which unequivocally expressed Catholic doctrine [HOMOOUSION]. It must be borne in mind in reading the Creeds which will presently be given, that the "pure" or genuine Arians believed that Christ was of a different substance from that of the Father [ANOMŒANS]—the Semi-Arians that

He was of a substance like that of the Father [Homoiousians], or in a less definite phrase, that He was like the Father [Homœans]; the last theory allowing an explanation in accordance with the Nicene symbol, as it might mean that Christ was like the Father in all things.

But there was not only little union as regards their theory amongst the Semi-Arian party, it was also composed of men of widely different principles and character. Though some merely sought to veil under vague and ambiguous terms their heretical belief, there were many others, holding substantially Catholic doctrine, who disliked the Nicene symbol [Homoousian], not only as apparently identical with Sabellianism, and as having (in their opinion) been already condemned by the Council of Antioch, but as being destitute of scriptural sanction or authority. Some of the Semi-Arian party have even been revered as saints and confessors, and St. Athanasius does not hesitate to speak of them as brothers really holding the true faith, though, for one reason or another, stumbling at the Nicene definition.[1]

The various creeds put forth by the party shew the subtle ingenuity with which a distinct expression of the Catholic doctrine was evaded, especially by the use of vague terms admitting a double meaning, and which might be understood either in an orthodox or heretical sense. The Epistle which Arius and his first disciples wrote to Bishop Alexander has already been given [Arianism]. Arius and Euzoius, when recalled from banishment, presented a confession to the Emperor Constantine, expressed in vague and ambiguous language (mostly in terms of Scripture), and only betraying by a single letter their own heretical doctrine.[2] Another confession was made in the Council of Constantinople against Marcellus [A.D. 336], which is not extant. Then followed two important confessions of the Council of Antioch, called the Council of the Dedication [A.D. 341]. This was assembled by the Eusebian party "not, as Socrates says, as if to condemn anything that had been set forth at Nice, but in fact with a determination to subvert the doctrine of 'consubstantiality,' by means of frequent councils and the publication of various expositions of faith, so as gradually to establish Arianism." The bishops assembled, after saying that they are not followers of Arius, though they admit the soundness of his opinions, state that they believe "in one God . . . and in one only begotten Son of God, subsisting before all ages, and co-existing with the Father that begat Him (συνόντα τῷ γεγεννηκότι αὐτόν Πατρὶ)—by Whom also all things visible and invisible were made; Who in the last days, according to the Father's good pleasure, descended and assumed flesh from the Holy Virgin, and having fully accomplished His Father's will, suffered, was raised, ascended into the heavens and sits at the right hand of the Father, and is coming to judge the living and the dead, and continues King and God for ever." In another Exposition put forth by the same council, a nearer approach is made to the Catholic faith. We believe "in one God the Father Almighty . . . and in one Lord Jesus Christ His Son, God the only begotten, by Whom all things were made: begotten of the Father before all ages, God of God, Whole of Whole, Only of Only, Perfect of Perfect, King of King, Lord of Lord; the living Word, the Wisdom, the Life, the true Light, the Way of truth, the Resurrection, the Shepherd, the Gate; immutable and inconvertible (ἄτρεπτον τε καὶ ἀναλλόιωτον); the unalterable Image (ἀπαράλλακτον εἰκόνα) of the Divinity, Substance, Power, Counsel and Glory of the Father; the First-born of all creation (τὸν πρωτότοκον πάσης κτίσεως); Who was in the beginning with God, God the Word, according as it is declared in the Gospel [John i. 1], and the Word was God by Whom all things were made, and in Whom all things have subsisted." After professing a belief in the Holy Spirit and referring to Christ's command to His Apostles to teach all nations, "baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost"—the Exposition goes on, "that is, of the Father Who is truly the Father, of the Son Who is truly the Son, of the Holy Spirit Who is truly the Holy Spirit; these epithets not being simply and unmeaningly (οὐχ ἁπλῶς οὐδὲ ἀργῶν) applied, but accurately expressing the proper person (ὑπόστασίν), glory, and order of those who are named, so that they are Three in Person, but One in mutual agreement (τῇ μὲν ὑποστάσει τρία· τῇ δὲ συμφωνίᾳ ἕν). Holding therefore this faith in the presence of God and of Christ, we anathematize all heretical and false doctrine. And if any one shall teach contrary to the right and sound faith of the Scriptures, affirming that there is or was a period or an age, before (ἢ καιρὸν ἢ αἰῶνα εἶναι ἢ γεγονέναι πρὸ . . .) the Son of God existed, let him be accursed. Or if any one shall say that the Son is a creation as one of the creatures, or that He is a branch or offspring (γέννημα), as one of the branches, and shall not hold each of the aforesaid doctrines as the Divine Scriptures have delivered them to us; or if any one shall teach or preach any other doctrine contrary to that which we have received, let him be accursed. For we truly believe and follow all things handed down to us from the sacred Scriptures by the prophets and apostles."[3]

Another Confession made a few months afterwards, also drawn up by the Eusebian party, was sent into France, to the Emperor Constans by Narcissus, Maris, Theodorus of Heraclea, and Mark of Arethusa in Syria. They profess to believe in "one God . . . and in His only begotten Son our Lord Jesus Christ, begotten of the Father before all ages, God of God, Light of Light, by whom all things in the heavens and upon the earth, both visible and invisible, were made . . . the Catholic Church accounts as aliens those who assert that the Son was made of things which are not, or of another substance and not of God, or that there was ever a time when He did not exist."[1] This creed, as Tillemont says, "contains in it nothing but what is true, but does not sufficiently guard against the poison of Arianism, having no expression in it opposing that heresy."

[1] Newman's Arians of the Fourth Century (the Semi-Arians), 1854.

[2] They say "we believe in one God the Father Almighty, and in the Lord Jesus Christ His Son, Who was 'made' of Him before all ages" (γεγενημένον, not γεγεννημένον, begotten). [Socrates, Eccl. Hist. lib. i. c. 26.]

[3] Socrates, Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. c. x.

After three years the Eastern bishops again assembled a synod at Antioch [A.D. 345], and composed another form of faith, sending it in proof of their orthodoxy into Italy by Eudoxius and others. This creed was called Macrostiche, or the Long Exposition. After repeating almost verbally the creed already given, it is added, "The holy and Catholic Church likewise anathematizes those also who say there are three Gods, or that Christ is not God before all ages . . . or that the Son was not begotten or that the Father begat not the Son by His own voluntary will. Neither is it safe to affirm that the Son had His existence from things that were not, since this is nowhere declared concerning Him in the divinely inspired Scriptures. Nor are we taught that He had His being from any other pre-existing substance besides the Father, but that He was truly begotten of God alone; for the Divine Word teaches that there is one unbegotten principle without beginning, the Father of Christ. But those who, unathorized by Scripture, rashly assert that there was a time when He was not, ought not to preconceive any antecedent interval of time, but God only Who without time begat Him: for both times and ages were made by Him. Yet it must not be thought that the Son is co-inoriginate, or co-unbegotten with the Father; for this could not be predicated when such a relationship exists. But we know that the Father alone being inoriginate and incomprehensible, has ineffably and incomprehensibly to all begotten, and that the Son was begotten before the ages, not being unbegotten like the Father, but has a beginning, viz. the Father Who begat Him, for the Head of Christ is God" [1 Cor. xi. 3]. After saying that Christ is "by nature (κατὰ φύσιν) true and perfect God," various heresies are condemned, as of Paul of Samosata and Photinus.[2]

The Emperors Constantius and Constans, desiring to restore peace to the Church, called a synod of the bishops of the Eastern and Western Church—Sardica [A.D. 347]. The Eastern (Arian) bishops refused to be present at the council, unless St. Athanasius and others were excluded from ecclesiastical communion. The Western bishops refusing to accept this condition, the Eastern bishops withdrew and assembled at Philippopolis. In their Confession of Faith, they profess to believe "in the Son of God begotten of the Father before all worlds, God of God, Light of Light, Who created all things," and they condemn those who say that "the Son was made of nothing, or that He was of another substance than the Divine Substance, and that He was not of God, or that there was a time when He was not the Son of God."[3]

[1] Socr. Eccl. Hist. lib. ii. c. 18. [2] Ibid. lib. ii. c. 19.
[3] See Dupin, Ecclesiastical Writers, vol. ii.

In the second Council of Sirmium[4] [A.D. 351], the heresy of Photinus was condemned, and three formularies of faith put forth—the first in Greek and the other two in Latin. In the former, in Greek, they who maintain that the Son had no beginning, or that He proceeded from an expansion of the substance of the Father, or that He is united to the Father without being subject to Him, are excommunicated. By the first of the Latin formularies, it is forbidden to say of the substance of the Godhead that the Son is either consubstantial, or of like substance with the Father, since such expressions do not occur in Scripture and are beyond man's understanding. It is asserted that the Father must be recognised as superior to the Son in honour, in dignity, and in divinity, and in His relationship as Father; and that the Son, like all created beings, is subject to the Father; that the Father had no beginning, and that the generation of the Son is unknown to all save the Father. In the second, the term "substance," is forbidden in reference to the Godhead, since "it is nowhere said in Holy Scripture that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are of the same substance. But we say in conformity with Holy Scripture that the Son is like unto the Father."[5]

In the third Council of Sirmium [A.D. 357], in which were present Potamius, Bishop of Lisbon, Valens, Ursacius, and Germinus, and other bishops, another creed was made, in which the word "consubstantial" was rejected, and it is asserted that the Father is greater than the Son, and that the Son had a beginning.[6]

By the Council of Ancyra [A.D. 358], where only a few Eastern bishops were present, the doctrine of "consubstantiality" was condemned, and likeness of substance asserted.[7]

As regards the councils hitherto given, the bishops assembled were generally of the Eastern Church, holding Semi-Arian opinions; in the next council, at Rimini in Italy [Ariminum, A.D. 359], the bishops were chiefly of the Western Church, and held the Nicene faith. Ursacius and Valens, of the Eastern Church (Arians), proposed that the definitions of the Council of Sirmium should be received, but the Western bishops would only acknowledge the Council of Nice or the Homoousian. They sent a message to the Emperor Constantine declaring their adherence to the Nicene symbol. On the other hand, the Arian party sent deputies, and prejudiced the Emperor in their favour. They afterwards assembled at Nicæ, a city of Thrace, and declared the definition of faith by the Western bishops at Ariminum null and void. They set forth a confession like that of Sirmium, wherein they declare that the Son is like the Father in all things, and reject the words consubstantial or hypostasis. The Emperor would not allow the bishops assembled at Rimini to leave the council till they had signed this confession, to which, unhappily, they assented, professing their agreement with the Eastern bishops and rejecting the [4] The first council held [A.D. 349] was occupied with the heresy of Photinus.

[5] Sozomen, Eccl. Hist. lib. iv. c. 6.
[6] Dupin, Eccl. Writers, vol. ii. [7] Ibid. vol. ii.

Homoousian.[1] Thus, as Dupin says, "the beginning of the council was glorious and the end deplorable." This is the council of which St. Jerome says, "the whole world groaned and wondered that it had become Arian (ingemuit totus orbis et Arianum se esse miratus est). The Western bishops did not intend to give up the faith of the Nicene Council, but they rejected the definition of Homoousian, which, as experience had proved, was absolutely necessary for its preservation, either through fear of the Emperor, who had threatened some of them, if disobedient, with banishment, or from a wish to return to their Churches.

Shortly after the Council of Ariminum, the Eastern bishops assembled at Seleucia [A.D. 359]. There came to this synod one hundred and sixty bishops of two different parties. One of them was purely Arian, and maintained that the Son of God was not at all like in substance to His Father. There were about forty of this party. The others, called Semi-Arians, made profession of believing the Son of God to be "like in substance," and rejected the errors of Arius and Aëtius. Of this party there were one hundred and five. The other bishops were probably Catholics, defenders of the consubstantiality. The Semi-Arian party present confirmed the Council of Antioch and signed it. The Acacian or Arian party composed a new confession of faith, in which the words "substance," "likeness of substance," and a "different substance" are equally condemned.[2]

Another synod was held at Antioch [A.D. 361], but its confession of faith is not extant. Also at Lampsacus [A.D. 365], in which Christ was declared to be like the Father.

The Semi-Arian party finding that the influence of Eudoxius (Arian) was all powerful with the Emperor Valens, resolved to put themselves under the protection of Valentinian, the orthodox Emperor of the West. To shew their union with the Western Church, they declared their agreement with the Nicene "Homoousian;" fifty-nine Semi-Arian bishops on this occasion gave their assent to the orthodox symbol [A.D. 366]. It was proposed to hold a council at Tarsus, to promote a general reconciliation and union, but the Emperor Valens interfering, a cruel persecution of the orthodox followed [A.D. 371], which lasted for several years.

"As to Semi-Arianism," says Dr. Newman, "it disappears from ecclesiastical history from the date of the Council of Tarsus; from which time the portion of the party which remained Nonconformist, is more properly designated Macedonian or Pneumatomachist, from the chief article of their heresy." [Newman's Arians, p. 218.]

SEMI-PELAGIANISM. This term marks the state of religious opinion that replaced Pelagianism in about the fourteenth year of its existence. It is a name, however, which the party designated by it never assumed, for they professed that they held

[1] Socrates, Eccl. Hist. lib. ii. c. 37.

[2] Sozomen, Eccl. Hist. lib. iv. c. 22; Dupin, vol. ii.; Tillemont's Arians.

Semi-Pelagianism

no distinctive point of Pelagian error; neither was it fixed upon them by the Augustinian following in the Church, who termed them roundly Pelagians, notwithstanding their renunciation of the more extreme views of their master. It was an invention of the later Schoolmen to mark a middle line of opinion between the hardy denial of grace on the Pelagian side, and the predestinarian theory of Augustine on the other, including the notion of irresistible grace, which he himself claimed to have been his own invention. "Nondum diligentius quæsiveram, nec adhuc inveneram qualis sit Electio Gratiæ." [De Præd. et Persev. i. 3.]

In the year A.D. 426, certain monks of Adrumetum, a free town in Byzacene Africa, having read Augustine's letter to Sixtus [Ep. 194], a presbyter and afterwards Bishop, of Rome, were struck with the novelty of the doctrine expressed, as well as alarmed at its tendency; speaking as it did of the predestination to life eternal of some, and of the final reprobation of others. The whole doctrine of grace, as laid down by Augustine, was of individual application. The taint of original sin affected each soul and body of man; each then had need of the same personal redemption by divine grace. And so far the doctrine of Augustine applied correctly, because scripturally, to individuals: his teaching was strictly according to the analogy of faith. But when he proceeded to further speculations on the purpose and will of God, as disposing of man everlastingly, either in the way of happiness or misery, by an arbitrary decree; and applied to individuals those statements of Scripture which, being of an universal character, are used with respect to the whole Body of Christ, the Church, and cannot be affirmed of individuals without hazarding statements that are not warranted by Scripture, from that moment there came a sure point of divergency. For, in truth, the predestination of individuals is nowhere spoken of in Scripture; otherwise than as of representative characters of entire classes, such as Jacob and Pharaoh. The redemption of the race of Adam having been predestined from all eternity, it was revealed to him as soon as redemption was needed. And when the Redeemer came forth from his seed, He was the Head of the Body, the Church of living souls in Him predestined to glory. All that the people of God therefore are justified in saying is, that they are of that Body which is predestined to glory, and that they hope to be inheritors of that glory if they continue to be living members of the Body; they in Christ and Christ in them; but of his own predestination to glory, or of the predestination of any other mortal man, no one can speak with certainty, and therefore none without presumption. The monks of Adrumetum then were astounded at the doctrine grown up within their memory. The moral effects of it, as they held, could not fail to be disastrous. Even in those of higher spiritual life, who could discern, by a conscience in harmony with the will of God, the daily working of divine grace, and were aware of the continuous development of the life of God within the soul, it would work harm by engendering spiritual pride; but others who, in the turmoil of life, were conscious of yielding to any of the temptations and allurements of sin that abound in the world, such a doctrine could scarcely fail to drive into great "wretchlessness of living." If, as they argued, man without divine grace is powerless for good, to what purpose are any endeavours that he may make; and how is it consistent with divine justice to punish those to whom He has not vouchsafed that grace. To strive against sin is useless without that aid; prayer and not action therefore is man's only resource. To strictures of this kind Augustine answered by putting forth his two works, De gratia et libero arbitrio, and De correptione et gratia; but they were little calculated to quiet the apprehensions of those who had misgivings with respect to the genuineness and practical working of such doctrines; they rather increased those misgivings. Since, therefore, there was a strong suspicion of novelty attaching to these extreme views, since also a positive shock to the Catholic faith had come from the side of the Pelagians, it was only natural that some "via media" should be essayed by moderate men, and an endeavour made to harmonize these conflicting systems of theology. The task was attempted by John Cassian, a monk of Scythian extraction, according to Gennadius [De Vir. Illustr. 61], or more probably Gothic, and ordained at Constantinople by Chrysostom, under whom he had ministered in the diaconate [Cass. De Inc. vii. 31]. After travelling in the Levant, and passing some time among the monks of Egypt, he had settled down at Marseilles, where he gathered around him a considerable body of monks; and established a double monastery for either sex, over which he presided. His works have always been useful. They are, Institutiones cœnobiorum, referring to Eastern and Egyptian monastic life; Collationes, or conversations held by him with the monks of Sceta in Egypt; and a refutation of Nestorianism. There is no reason to believe with Baronius [A.D. 433, sec. 42] that these works have either been mutilated or interpolated by friend or foe. The two first are the fountain-head of opinions known as Semi-Pelagian. Prosper has expressed their general drift with great exactness when he says, "You imagine that you have taken every precaution against the false statements of the Pelagians. . . . Yet you are neither wholly agreed with heretics nor with catholic Christians, . . . you have devised some shapeless 'tertium quid,' some condition of your own, whereby you neither make peace with our enemies nor remain loyal to us" [c. 2].

The practical teaching of the school of Antioch, to be traced in every page of Chrysostom's Commentaries and Homilies, had impressed itself also on the mind of his scholars. Cassian was well versed in Greek theology, had a thorough appreciation of the better points of monasticism, and to an earnest piety added a considerable amount of shrewdness and common sense. He appears to have had no ambition to place himself at the head of a party, but simply to have given a direction to the religious training and moral discipline of his monks. Thus in his Institutes [v. 33] he charges his monks to mind the cleansing of the heart within, rather than busy themselves with doctrinal speculations and endless discussions. Sin had caused all the perplexed theology that had set the world in flames, and had thrown a shade across the light of divine revelation. With regard to discussions upon divine grace, let the monk take to himself the simple faith of the Apostolic fishermen in an earnest and pure heart, for so alone could he attain a godly perception of the truth. "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God" [John vii. 17]. Cassian acknowledged the universal deterioration of human nature by the Fall; and on other points held very much the Eastern view with regard to the reaction of the flesh against the spirit, a weakened will, and the necessity for man's justification through the grace of Christ. But he assigned also an unlimited scope to the divine goodness and love, that willeth the salvation of all and bends everything to that end, as the final cause of even a sinner's punishment. The warfare between the flesh and the spirit began at the Fall, but it is no unmitigated evil, for it is man's discipline; it teaches him to know himself, and helps to drive forth from his heart presumption on the one hand, and indolence on the other [cf. Schiller's Phil. Br.]. Man, he said, has cause to thank God not only for the freedom of will with which he is endowed; but also for daily acts of goodness in delivering him from evil, and in working together with him, so as to give him the mastery of his passions, shield him from harm, preserve him from sin, and quicken the intellect to understand the law that He has given us as our aid. Thus he and Pelagius regarded the law from a very different point of view,—Pelagius having made it throughout man's principal "adjutorium," to the supercession of divine grace. Elsewhere he expressly condemns the main position of Pelagius. "Let no one imagine," he says, "that by this we give support to the profane notion of some, who assert that the sum of salvation is in our own power; and, by ascribing everything to free-will, make the grace of God to be dispensed according to each man's merit" [Coll. xiii. 16]. "We have reason," he said, "to thank God for our chastisement for sin, and for drawing our free-will, so stubborn in its nature and prone to evil, in any degree to the path of virtue" [Inst. vii. 18]. He entirely ignores irresistible grace and absolute decrees of divine predestination, though his doctrine with respect to preventing grace agrees generally with that of Augustine. "It is neither of him that willeth nor of him that runneth," he said, divine grace must not only co-operate with man, but even anticipate his efforts, as "initia sanctæ voluntatis" [Collat. iv. 4; xiii. 3]. In his celebrated 13th Collation, he speaks more at large on the mutual relation between grace and the will of man. He there says, "It is impossible to affirm which has the precedence; and the attempt to define this point has been a copious source of error. Thus he is not always consistent with himself; as it is not sufficient for the sick man to wish to be healed, so a man's good will," he says, "is not sufficient, unless God's grace gives strength to perform" [Coll. xiii. 9]. In fact, he can neither agree with those who make the gift of grace dependent upon human merit, nor with others who deny that man has any power in himself to originate good in his own heart; and while he acknowledges in some cases the operation of preventing grace, he more usually claims for human will its own initiation of good. "Human nature, though fallen, had still much good in it. Adam by transgression gained a knowledge of evil, that he had not before, but he lost not his knowledge of good that he had. . . . We must beware how we so ascribe all human good to God, as to leave nothing but unmixed evil in human nature. . . . There is no doubt but that the seeds of virtue have been sown by God's goodness in the souls of all, but unless God gives vitality to this germ, it can bring no fruit to perfection" [Coll. xiii. 12]. These opinions formed a nucleus around which much floating suspicion of Augustine's more advanced doctrines speedily gathered; a general dislike for the theory of irresistible grace and divine predestination being the principal bond of union. But no separation from the Church was thereby caused. The people in general had nothing to do with abstruse questions that affected learned men alone. The party thus forming asserted man's partial, not thorough depravation by the Fall; and held that a man's own free-will should be his preparative for the reception of divine grace. Like Hilary of Poitiers, they declared "Nostrum est velle, Dei perficere." [Pelagianism. Hilary.] They set aside the doctrinal development of those later days, and recurred to Scripture, as they professed, and to the earlier teaching of the Church. Such was the reaction of an essentially Greek theology against the sway of Augustinian opinion in the West.

Staunch partisans, however, were found, who branded this Gallican party with the name of Pelagians. The master-spirit among them was Prosper of Aquitania, whom the Gothic invasion had driven from his home, and compelled to take refuge at Marseilles. He and his friend Hilarius (not of Arles) sent each a letter to Augustine, asking him to clear up any ambiguities in his exposition, and to refute the errors that they indicated. He answered by putting forth his two books, De Prædestinatione Sanctorum, and De Bono Perseverantiæ. With his usual candour, also, he pointed out in what respect those who impugned his doctrines were not to be charged with Pelagian error. These were among the last works of Augustine, whose death followed, A.D. 430. Prosper then appears to have considered it as a holy duty to uphold the opinions of Augustine against all comers. He repaired to Rome with Hilarius, and obtained from Celestine a letter to the Gallican bishops who had adopted Cassian's views; dealing, however, more in general censure than in directions upon the true points of controversy; upholding the necessity for grace, of which both parties were fully persuaded, but disposing of the real "crux" in the matter, the doctrines of irresistible grace and predestination, in the words "Profundiores vero difficilioresque partes incurrentium quæstionum, quas latius pertractarunt qui hæreticis restiterunt, sicut non audemus contemnere, ita non necesse habemus adstruere" [Mansi, iv. 454]. The sentence may possibly allude to the Auctoritates de gratia Dei, or short extracts from preceding bishops of Rome and African councils on the subject of divine grace, which are found annexed to Celestine's letter in the more ancient editions, affirming the doctrine of Augustine, but reserving that of predestination. On the other side, certain great names, chiefly of the monastic order, were arrayed. The Commonitorium of Vincent of Lerins was principally directed against the doctrinal development of Augustine, as being unsupported by the Catholic tradition of the Church [Voss, Hist. Pelag. i. 10; Noris, ii. 11; Jansen, Hær. Pel. 17; Rivet. Crit. Sacr. iv. 24; Neander, K. Gesch.]. In a fragment preserved of his second part, he retorts the words of Celestine, without indicating their source, but evidently having in his mind the author of the book De Prædest. Sanctor.; "Desinat incessere novitas vetustatem." When, therefore, Prosper made answer on behalf of Augustinian doctrine, against certain "capitula objectionum" of one Vincentius, the writer seems to have been no other than the Abbot of Lerins. Prosper next assailed the monastic party in a Latin poem, De Ingratis, and fixed upon them the stigma of Pelagianism. Afterwards he composed his principal work, Pro Augustino contra Collatorem; i.e. against the thirteenth Collatio of Cassian, in which he softens down in some degree the harshness, but gives up nothing of the principle, of the Augustinian theory. Another work, written in the same spirit, entitled De Vocatione Gentium, is found among the works of Leo [ed. Quesnel], and attributed variously to him, to Prosper, and to Hilarius, in which the author draws a distinction between "Gratia generalis," or the revelation of God in creation, in nature, and in history, which but for man's sin would have been all-sufficient, and "Gratia specialis," accorded to those who shall be saved. This grace does no violence to the human will, which is, in fact, its instrumental agent; but it raises the will from its lowest level as a sensual will, and from its intermediate condition as a natural will, to the dignity and efficacy of a will reclaimed by divine grace, or a spiritual will. But it is grace which prepares the will of the recipient to receive yet further measures of God's gift. The action of God's grace in this sense is a "specialis universitas," God having called to Himself by a special act the objects of His grace from every nation and in every period of the world.

These attempts to exhibit the theory of the great Doctor of the Western Church in a milder light were thwarted by others who upheld the rigid notion of predestination, and pushed it to consequences against which Augustine himself was anxious to guard. This caused the Gallican party to fix upon them the name of Predestinatiani, though there never was such a heresy as the "Predestinarian." In fact, this class of opinion only swerved as far in the extreme assertion of Augustinianism as the Semi-Pelagian fell short of it in mildness and moderation. As all stratagems are allowed in war, so, in the opinion of some, theological error may be combated by indirect as well as direct modes of attack. This seems to have been the idea of the writer of a short work first published by the Jesuit Sirmond [Par. 1643; Galland, B. P. x.], entitled "Prædestinatus, sive Prædestinatorum hæresis et libri S. Augustino temere adscripti refutatio." It first gives the usual heresiological list, which closes with these Predestinati; the penultimate heresy being that of Nestorius fixes the date of the list as a work of the middle of the fifth century. Then follows the work itself thus charged with error, supposed by Neander [K. Gesch. ii. 1202, Hamb.] to have been written by some extravagant partisan of Augustine's doctrine, but considered by Möller [Herzog, R. W.], with greater probability, to be a not unskilful cento of axioms from Augustine and Prosper, which were then pushed to extreme conclusions by the Semi-Pelagian writer for the purpose of discrediting the opinions of the rival school of theology. The book indicates a double predestination, not only to life and death eternal, but to righteousness and sin; numerical election and reprobation by an irreversible decree: so that those whom God has predestined from everlasting to life, careless, sinful and reluctant though they may be, will infallibly inherit glory; while those who have been doomed by a like decree to death, though they use all earnest endeavour, run without a possibility of attaining the goal of their hopes. An element also is thrown in that belongs not to Augustine; for this election and reprobation is based not on any arbitrary action of the Divine Will, but upon the Divine prescience, as knowing who would accept and who would reject the offer of mercy through Christ; an idea afterwards caught up by Arminius. The third section of this work gives the Semi-Pelagian refutation of these notions; and indicates, as the editor says, so strong a similarity with statements in the Commentary of Arnobius the Younger, as to create the presumption that he was the author of the work.

The nearer approximation to each other that had been made by the two more moderate parties, leaving differences scarcely greater than those which affect Church principle among ourselves, has happily caused great scantiness of material for carrying on the history. Only by fits and starts incidents transpire that indicate the slumbering embers. The political uneasiness of the times made men practical rather than speculative in their religion, and Semi-Pelagianism was rather in the ascendant. Shortly after the middle of the fifth century a question arose between Lucidus, a presbyter, and Faustus, Bishop of Riez, in Provence, and formerly a monk of Lerins, the presbyter being an advanced predestinarian, the bishop, as the presbyter would term it, Semi-Pelagian. The bishop having admonished Lucidus in person, afterwards wrote to him a letter, setting forth in brief terms his own view of the doctrine of grace. The bishop shewed that man's exertions must co-operate with divine grace; to depreciate those exertions, and to maintain an absolute predestination, is worse than Pelagian error. Man who is born in sin requires the grace of God, and has no room for pride in his performances; that which we receive from God's hand is a gift, not wages; but the sinner that perishes is lost for not making use of his opportunities of grace, and the saint who perseveres to the end, might, at any period of his course, have fallen from grace. Christ died for all, and would have all men to be saved, and it is a pernicious error to say that when the baptized falls into sin, he perishes through Adam's guilt and the original taint of his nature; as also to affirm that a man is damned through the foreknowledge of God, and that the vessel fitted for destruction can never become a vessel of honour. Lucidus appeared before a council, probably that of Arles [A.D. 475], where high predestinarian tenets were censured, and wrote a retractation. This and another synod held at Lyons shortly afterwards on the same question, gave occasion to Faustus to write a work, which at once achieved a great reputation, De Gratia et Humanæ Mentis Libero Arbitrio. The book was answered half a century later by Cæsarius of Arles in a treatise of similar title, De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio, which, however, is lost.

The works of Fulgentius, Bishop of Ruspæ, De Incarnatione et Gratia and De Veritate Prædestinationis et Gratiæ, were caused by the following circumstances. In the commencement of the sixth century, some Scythian monks, stout advocates of the doctrine of grace from their hatred of Nestorianism, with whom Celestius had been joined in condemnation by the Council of Ephesus [Conc. Eph. can. i. iv.], presented a confession of faith to the legates of Pope Hormisdas in Constantinople, in which they affirmed their belief that the will of man was powerless for any other object than to "discern and desire" carnal and worldly matters; but that with respect to life eternal it could neither "think, nor will, nor desire, nor perform" anything but by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. They further declared their detestation of the tenet "nostrum est velle Dei perficere." They met with a cold reception from the legates, and fared no better with Hormisdas, whom they next assayed. They then sought the surer sympathy of the African bishops in Sardinia, who had been driven from their sees by Vandal oppression, of whom Fulgentius was both "tongue and headpiece." Their letter condemned not only Pelagian tenets, but also Faustus as the impugner of Predestination. It called forth from Fulgentius, who does not seem to have had any previous knowledge of the work of Faustus, the former of the two works above mentioned against Semi-Pelagianism. The answer of Hormisdas to a second application from Constantinople not having been more explicit than the first, Fulgentius wrote the second work, which was more particularly directed against that of Faustus. At the same time the exiled bishops sent a synodical letter to Constantinople [Mansi, viii. 591], in which the doctrine of Augustine was fully affirmed, and the work of Faustus pronounced to be heretical, A.D. 529. A council was held at Arausio (Orange), in the province of Arles, by fourteen bishops; the acts of which have been preserved [Mansi, viii. 711]. A direction, however, was given to their deliberation by the Roman See, from whence certain heads of citations from preceding Fathers had been sent, in all probability the Auctoritates de Gratia to which allusion has already been made. The twenty-five propositions of this synod are expressed in the language of Augustine and Prosper; the doctrines of original sin, affecting the soul as well as the body of man, and of the necessity of divine grace are affirmed; but that of the propagation and imputation of Adam's sin is reserved. Man in himself is stated to be wholly powerless for good, and the necessity for preventing grace is strongly asserted. Man has nothing to glory in, even though a reward be promised for good works, "gratia quæ non debetur præcedit ut fiant." So far also from advocating irresistible grace, and arbitrary predestination, they affirm their belief that the baptized, by the co-operating grace of Christ, "quæ ad salutem animæ pertinent possint et debeant, si fideliter laborare voluerint, adimplere." The acts of this synod were formally confirmed by the See of Rome at the instance of Cæsarius. A similar expression of doctrine was made by a council at Valence, in the province of Vienne, at about the same time; but the problem remained unsolved, how to reconcile the opposing motive powers of grace and free will. Augustine naturally continued to be regarded as the great light of the Western Church, to whose opinions all deferred, without accepting his extreme conclusions. But in the Middle Ages there was an occasional tendency to dispute his authority. These questions entered into the Gotteschalk controversy, and afforded plentiful matter for discussion to the Schoolmen. They were among the problems also discussed at the Reformation. Arminius alone ventured to cut the knot without attempting to untie it; and in more modern times the Jesuit body has resigned Augustine to the patronage of the Jansenists. [JESUIT. JANSENIST. Neander, K. Gesch. ii. 1173-1217, 2nd ed. Hamb. 1847. Walch, Ketzereien, v. Voss, H. Pelag. Noris, H. Pelag. W. Möller, in Herzog's R. W. Schönemann; Bibl. P. Lat., and the authorities cited under PELAGIANISM.]

SEPTUAGESIMA. The name immemorially given to the Sunday which follows the last Sunday in Epiphany season. The reason of its application to the day is uncertain. Some liturgical writers, (as, for example, Pamelius,) trace it to the association of the ancient monastic Lent of seventy days [LENT] with the seventy years captivity of Israel in Babylon, as the forty days' Lent is associated with the forty years' wandering in the wilderness. But it is more probable that the name is associated with the Latin name of Lent itself, the three preceding Sundays and weeks which occur between Quadragesima and Epiphany being respectively called Quinquagesima, Sexagesima, and Septuagesima, as roughly representing the fiftieth, sixtieth, and seventieth days before Easter.

Septuagesima Sunday is, in ordinary years, the sixty-third day before Easter, and in Leap-years, the sixty-fourth. In the English Prayer-Book it has a second title affixed, "the third Sunday before Lent."

SEPTUAGINT. [VERSIONS.]

SERMON. [PREACHING.]

SESSION OF CHRIST. The perpetual presence of our Lord's Human Nature in the highest glory of heaven. The statement of the fact appears in all the Latin forms of the Creed, its earlier words being, "Sedet ad dexteram Patris," which developed into "Sedet ad dexteram Dei Patris Omnipotentis" at some time not later than the sixth century. The article does not appear in the Creed of Nicæa, but in the Constantinopolitan expansion of that formulary it is given in words which are similar to those of the ancient Latin Church, καθεζόμενον ἐκ δεξιῶν τοῦ Πατρὸς.

1. This exaltation of Christ's Human Nature implies an actual translation of His body and soul to heaven, and their actual continued abode there; and that in uninterrupted identity with the body and soul which had been born of the Blessed Virgin Mary. This identity was historically established by the chosen witnesses of the Resurrection (after an intercourse of forty days with their risen Saviour), seeing His Ascension from the earth [ASCENSION] to some region above the earth [HEAVEN], and hearing the words of the angels, "Why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, Which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven" [Acts i. 11]. Not long after which the martyr Stephen (who had probably known the Lord personally) exclaimed at the moment of his death, as he saw the King of Martyrs standing to welcome His protomartyr to Heaven, "Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God" [Acts vii. 56].

Thus the fact of our Lord's Ascension to heaven, and His Session or continual presence there, amounts to this: that He ascended and abides there not in spirit only but in the "substance of His mother," which was "born in the world" and "crucified under Pontius Pilate:" that He sat down at the right hand of God not as God only but as God-Man: that His human nature was not absorbed into but remains united with that Godhead to which it had been united by the Incarnation. And although a certain change had passed over Christ's body in its Resurrection, so that from a "natural body" it had become a "spiritual body," yet He gave evidence that it was in some degree, at least, subject to the laws of corporeal substance, "handle Me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see Me have" [Luke xxiv. 39], thus establishing beforehand the fact that the presence of His body in any place is such as the presence of His body had been before His death. Such a presence may be subject to exceptional circumstances, and may have capacities of motion different from those which it possessed in an unchanged condition; but its presence is still of a local nature, and not that of Omnipresent Deity, as is maintained by Ubiquitarians [UBIQUITY]. Although, therefore, the local presence of a body and soul united to a Divine Nature, of which no local presence can be predicated, is a mystery not to be explained, it is one which cannot be set aside without denying the force of all the evidence which testifies to Christ's actual Resurrection and Ascension. Any attempt to reconcile the fact of Christ's local bodily Presence in heaven with His Eucharistic presence in the Elements of the Blessed Sacrament must necessarily fail from want of knowledge respecting the properties of His spiritual body. The two facts are established on good grounds, and our inability to reconcile them does not nullify the evidence on which they are established. "These things are not mutually repugnant that our Saviour Himself ever sitteth at the right hand of the Father in heaven, according to the natural mode of existing, and that, nevertheless, He is sacramentally present unto us in His own substance by that manner of existing, which, though we can scarcely express it in words, we yet can, through thought illuminated by faith, understand and believe to be possible with God" [Conc. Trident, sess. xiii. cap. 1].

2. The Session of Christ was accomplished partly with reference to the glory of His own Person, and partly with reference to His work as the Saviour of mankind. It was fitting that when the Human Nature, which had been hypostatically united to the Divine Nature, had fulfilled on earth the purpose for which it had been conceived and born, it should be taken up to the highest glory and not left in the place of its humiliation. Wherefore God highly exalted Him and said unto Him, "Sit Thou on My right hand until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool."

But it was also necessary for the fulfilment of the purpose of the Incarnation that the Human Nature of Christ should have its abiding place in heaven. For the Incarnation is to fulfil perfectly the original purpose of man's being: to take up the broken continuity of his life and to carry it on to its intended terminus. Now that terminus was the place of the divine Presence; and thither it was that Christ's Human Nature went after its earthly work had been accomplished, that an entrance might be made within the veil that had hitherto shut out God from the sight even of the highest saint. By this exaltation of our nature in the Person of Christ, a capacity was originated for its exaltation in ourselves. Our manhood had been made unfit to dwell even in the earthly paradise, much more to dwell in heaven. But being taken into the Godhead by the Incarnation, it was made fit to dwell not only in paradise but in heaven: and since Christ originated a system in which He was the Head of a large number, the Firstborn among many brethren, He thus carried our manhood to heaven as the "Forerunner" of those who become associated in that system, joined to that Head, made brothers to that Firstborn.

Thus the Session of Christ is the complement of the Incarnation; and He Who was the firstfruits of the Resurrection becomes the firstfruits of the Exaltation to God's right hand. "I go," said He, "to prepare a place for you . . . that where I am, there ye may be also" [John xiv. 2, 3]. Therefore we enter into the holiest, that is into heaven, by a "new and living way which He hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, His flesh" [Heb. x. 20]. He is the Forerunner of mankind, exalted to the Father's right hand, not for Himself alone, but also for us, that all the sanctified may follow their Forerunner within the veil, and appear in the presence of God. As God has quickened men together with Christ, raising them from death and sin by virtue of His rising Who said "I am the Resurrection and the Life," so has He given them to "sit together in heavenly places" by virtue of His exaltation Who said "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me." By His lifting up to the Cross, He draws all men with cords of love from the world to the Church. By His lifting up to Session at the right hand of the throne of Majesty, He draws all His elect on high, that where the Head is there the body may be also.

For the association between the Session of Christ and His INTERCESSION see the article under the latter word.

SEXAGESIMA. The name of the Sunday which represents the sixtieth day before Easter. It is actually the fifty-sixth day; or the beginning of the eighth week before Easter. [LENT.]

SHECHINAH is a word of later Hebraism, signifying the indwelling Majesty of the Godhead. It is neither the cloud nor the glory made perceptible to human sense in the Holy of Holies, or standing over the Tabernacle, for though these terms are of perpetual recurrence, the Targum renders neither the one nor the other by the term Shechinah. But it signifies the Majesty of the Godhead, of which the cloud of glory and the fire of the burning bush were the external symbols [GLORY]; a created brightness, which, according to Maimonides [Moreh Nevochim, i. 64], the Deity caused to appear whenever He determined to reveal His Presence; as in the consecration of the Tabernacle, "The cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the Tabernacle" [Exod. xl. 34, 35]; and as in the dedication of the Temple, "the cloud of glory filled the Sanctuary" [1 Kings viii. 10, 11]. The continual presence of God with His people under the theocracy was expressed by "Shachan," to dwell. He "dwelt" in the bush [Deut. xxxiii.

16]; He "dwelleth between the cherubim" [1 Sam. iv. 4]; and from that verb the term Shechinah is derived. That indwelling of the Most High as the everlasting King was expressed by the effulgence of fire, with which the vapour of smoke is inseparably connected, or as shadow is with light. But since shadow is the privation of light, so the fire and cloud denote everything existing by the will of God, both of a positive and of a negative relation; in the language of philosophical ontology, whether ancient or modern, ὄν and οὐκ ὄν, "seyn" and "nicht seyn." "A cloud," says Abarbanel [Exod. xl. 34], "was round about Him as smoke is always about fire; and as light shews itself in the midst of clouds, so the glory of the Lord was as fire in the midst of clouds and darkness." Thus symbolized, the presence of the Lord led the people in their exodus from Egypt. That the Deity should become visible to mortal sense in fire or cloud can never be the truth [Fetichism]; and since the cloud of glory was not permanent, it has been resolved by some into the vapour of incense [Vitringa, Baur, Ewald, Winer]. The bush, however, on Mount Sinai burned with no cloud of incense, and this instance is sufficient to shew, by parity of reasoning, that the cloud of glory in the Tabernacle was something preternatural. God's government of His people was symbolized by these outward tokens of the esoteric Shechinah. The radiant glory declared the universal presence of the Deity in blessing His creatures, as light pervades the whole universe, quickening and energizing; while His judicial action in punishing disobedience and rebellion was shewn forth by volumed clouds shrouding the light [Hengstenberg]: and when disobedience had reached its culminating point, the woes denounced by the Almighty [Deut. xxviii. 15-68] were brought to pass, the Shechinah, so far as any visible emblem was concerned, was finally withdrawn, and the depth of humiliation into which God's ancient people sunk only made their ancient glory the more conspicuous. But He Who brings good out of evil was preparing His people for a more majestic presence; and the loss sustained by the gross carnal Israelite realized to the spiritual Israel that truer Shechinah, the indwelling of God in the faithful heart through the Spirit. The prophets, always more spiritual than the Law, shew a deep consciousness of this better presence; "Thus saith the High and Lofty One that inhabiteth [shochen] eternity; I dwell [esh'chon] in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit" [Isa. xlvii. 15]. "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty" [Psa. xci. 1]. In the fulfilment of time this more spiritual presence was declared by symbols once more made evident to the eye; and the Shechinah was present in the light that shone around the shepherds of Bethlehem by night; it overshadowed the Apostles in the bright cloud of the Transfiguration [Matt. xvii. 5; 2 Pet. i. 17]; and the cloud that received the Saviour out of the sight of His disciples on His Ascension was no other than the emblem of the Glorified, Who shall come again as the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven to judge both quick and dead.

The Shechinah of God's presence in the heart of His people is a matter of frequent reference in the New Testament, and the terms σκηνή and σκηνοῦν [Rev. xxi. 3; John i. 14], in sound as in sense, are applications of the Hebrew verb "Shachan." The power of God and the wisdom of God in Christ are enshrined in His Church as its very life, as the glory of God was tabernacled of old between the cherubim [compare John i. 14, xiv. 17, 23; Rom. viii. 8, 9, 11; 1 Cor. iii. 16; 2 Cor. vi. 16; Col. ii. 9; 2 Tim. i. 14, vi. 16; Tit. ii. 13; 1 Pet. iv. 14; 1 John iv. 12-16]. It was the realization of Israel's hope, for the Targums also speak of a restoration of the Shechinah in the days of the Messiah [Ezek. xliii. 7, 9; Hag. i. 8; Zech. ii. 10]. And, in point of fact, the term was first introduced in the Targums, where it was used to soften down the anthropomorphisms of Hebrew theology. So that, wherever in the Hebrew text definite and restricted action is ascribed to the Absolute and Universal, it becomes indefinite and free when attributed to the Shechinah, or majesty of the Most High. When God, for instance, is said to "dwell" with His people, the term acquires an abstract character by transfusion into His "Majesty was made to dwell," "Sarah Shechinah," שרה being the verb that invariably expresses the presence of the Shechinah in the Chaldee and Rabbinical Hebrew. "God standeth in the congregation of the mighty" [Psa. lxxxii. 1] becomes "His Shechinah dwelleth" [see also Psa. xvi. 8, xliv. 25, lxxxviii. 6; Jer. xxxiii. 5; and Maimonides, Moreh Nevochim, i. 27]. The Shechinah seems at times in Rabbinical writings to be synonymous with "glory," but the two terms combine by a common Hebraism into one complex idea; thus Rabbi Bechai, in his Commentary on the Pentateuch, says that the Shechinah and Glory are convertible terms, הכבוד שהוא השכינה; and the two are combined in the Targum on Isa. vi. 5, "The glory of the Shechinah," but this means merely "the indwelling glory," as in ver. 6, the words "from before His Shechinah on the throne of glory," mean simply "from before His glorious Presence." In Hag. i. 8, also, "Ecab'dah," "I will be glorified," is rendered "there I will cause My Shechinah to dwell with glory," signifying "My glorious Presence," or Majesty. The terms, therefore, are scarcely co-ordinates, but they stand rather in the relation of subject and predicate. There is better evidence that the term, as Elias Levita declares in the Thisbi, is the Holy Spirit and the Spirit of Prophecy, as being the very evidence of the Divine Presence. So in the Targum on 1 Sam. i. 15, Hannah, when unjustly charged by Eli, remonstrates with him for his uncharitable suspicion, and says, "the Shechinah and the Holy Spirit is not in thee in this matter." Yet, on the other hand, the Shechinah is apparently distinguished from the Holy Spirit in the Talmudic rationale for the K'ri and Ktib, or marginal and textual variation [Masora in Scriptural vol.] in Hag. i. 8.

Here the text reads אכבר, the margin has אכברה by the addition of the emphatic ה. This is the numerical equivalent for 5; and as the treatise Joma says, it was omitted in the text for the purpose of indicating the five particulars in which the second temple was defective as compared with the first, viz.: 1. the Ark of the Covenant, with the cherubic figures; 2. the Fire from heaven; 3. the Shechinah; 4. the Holy Spirit, limited however to the Spirit of Prophecy by the ancient author of the Arueh; and 5. the Urim and Thummim, where the Holy Spirit, if not distinct from the Spirit of Prophecy, is something different from the Shechinah.

The Cabbala, adopting the monstrous notion of an arrhenothele Deity, makes the Spirit the feminine principle, "Ruach" in Hebrew being a feminine noun; thus where the Supreme is king over all, the Shechinah is queen [Zohar, iii. 93]. It was the last of ten Sephiroth, identical with Malcuth [Cabbala], which was itself an equivalent for the Holy Spirit. Altogether, therefore, it may be affirmed that the Shechinah of later Hebraism is to be identified with the Holy Spirit of a truer theology. It is said to rest on men of a sanguine temperament, but to avoid the phlegmatic; to seek out the lively and cheerful, but to eschew the mourner. Thus when Jacob mourned for Joseph [Gen. xxxvii. 34] the Shechinah departed from him; afterwards it returned to him when his spirit revived on learning that his son was well and high in honour [Gen. xlv. 27]. The "Shechinah rested upon him," says R. Salomon Jarchi; "the Holy Spirit," as Onkelos declares; "the Spirit of Prophecy" is Jonathan's explanation. The three terms, therefore, seem to be convertible. Hence, too, Maimonides says that the inspiration of the LXX. was due to the Shechinah which rested on the translators; and the highly ancient Talmudic treatise, the Pirke Aboth, says in one place that the Shechinah is vouchsafed to any ten men assembled for the purpose of studying the Law, and elsewhere that any two men may be similarly favoured. Our Lord, therefore, asserted His own Godhead in words that were perfectly intelligible to His hearers when He declared, "where two or three are gathered together in My Name, there am I in the midst of them" [Matt. xviii. 20]. [See further the article in Buxtorf's Bibl. Rabbin. where many instances of the use of this term in the various Targums are cited.]

SIBYLLINE ORACLES. The association between Christian theology and the Sibylline books of classical Rome is illustrated by the familiar words of the Dies Iræ, which attribute to the latter a prophecy respecting the end of the world,—

> "Dies iræ, dies illa,
> Solvet sæclum in favillâ
> Teste David cum Sibyllâ."

The oracles of the Sibyl or Sibyls were, in fact, much spoken of by some of the early Fathers, and still more by Mediæval writers, under the supposition that they contained prophetic utterances respecting the Christian dispensation, although they proceeded from heathen prohetesses.

The name of Sibyl is derived by Lactantius (on the authority of Varro), from the Doric forms of the words Διὸς βουλή, which were Σιὸς βόλλα; and hence the name is considered to have meant "she who tells the counsel of Zeus," and to have been a name given to all prophetesses. From very early times, however, the number of the Sibyls was given as ten, viz. the Persian, Libyan, Delphian, Cimmerian, Erythræan, Samian, Cumæan, Hellespontic, Phrygian, and Tiburtine[1] [Lactant. Divin. Inst. i. 6].

Of the Sibylline oracles there were at least four successive versions. [1.] The three books acquired in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, and preserved at Rome with great care. They were consulted only on occasions of grave importance, and then by a decree of the Senate. This collection could never have been seen by the early Christians, as it was destroyed by fire during the civil war between Marius and Sulla [c. B.C. 90]. But its contents were not wholly unknown, as is testified by references in Cicero and Virgil. [2.] A compilation of about one thousand verses, made to replace the former, transcribed from other Sibylline collections, chiefly those of Erythra. These, like the original, were preserved in the Capitol. Several adulterated copies of this collection got into circulation, but they were suppressed by Augustus [A.D. 19], who had the genuine verses separated from the spurious ones. [3.] A series apparently the work of an Alexandrian Jew. It may have been only an adaptation of the last-named collection; but it is clear that an intermediate version was current between the second and the fourth, because Josephus and some of the early Fathers quote verses which do not appear in the modern books, and which could not possibly have been found in the earlier transcripts. [4.] A collection still extant, forming an addition to the second. Some are the verses acquired in Sulla's time, but most are probably the "rhapsody" of a Christian of the second century, who utilized the popularity of the Sibylline oracles as a means of spreading the faith. An edict was published [A.D. 142] against reading the books, and Honorius [A.D. 399] ordered them to be destroyed.

The modern collection is essentially different from what is known of the original. The verses we now read presuppose throughout the existence of one God. They are, moreover, precise and circumstantial, whereas the original were ambiguous, and adapted (as far as we can gather) to any event. "Callide enim, qui illa composuit, perfecit, ut, quodcumque accidisset, prædictum videretur, hominum et temporum definitione sublata" [Cicero, De Divinatione, ii. 110.] The old verses were acrostics, and the first line an anagram containing the acrostic. Cicero points out how this proves art and diligence, and not a raving or sudden inspiration, as commonly held. The extant collection of Christian date has but a single acrostic, the famous Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Θεοῦ Υἱός, Σωτήρ, Σταυρός, and the first line does not contain it. They are written in Greek hexameters, and contained in fourteen books, of different length, having in all several thousand lines. A portion of these were first printed in 1549, and are printed entire again in Gallandi's Bibliotheca Veterum Patrum [A.D. 1764], in Greek and Latin. The later books were published by Cardinal Mai in 1828. In Gallandi's Prolegomena [sec. xvi.], there is a valuable discussion of the character and authorship of the books, and a list of editions. Internal evidence is adduced, which appears to fix the date. The author says of Hadrian, Αἴλινος ἔκποτε καιρός, ὅτι λίνος αὐτὸν ὀλεῖται [bk. viii. 59]. This was not true; but he had attempted suicide, and so this line must have been written before he died. The Sibyl errs also in saying, Τρεῖς ἄρξουσιν, ὁ δὲ τρίτος ὀψὲ κρατήσει ἁπάντων. This verse is explained thus: Hadrian had adopted Antoninus in the beginning of the year in which he died [A.D. 138], and had made a condition that he should in turn adopt Marcus and Verus Antoninus. Verus was youngest, and the Sibyl thought he would come last to the throne, but he died. These considerations point to the date A.D. 138 as that when the books were written in their present form.

[1] Tacitus writes of them at a much earlier date, that "una seu plures fuere" [Tacit. Ann. vi. 12].

But the Christians were not the only writers of "Sibylline oracles." Josephus [Antiq. i. 4] quotes a verse referring to the tower of Babel, which shews that the Jews had made the same use of the oracles as the Christians did at a later time.[1] The Christian Sibyl of the second century was of the philosophical school, but there are many references to Jewish rites and ceremonies, such as praising God before meat [iv. 25]. There is also a description of sacrifices [iii. 511], as well as predictions respecting the future calamities of the nation [iii. 151]. Dodwell and others attribute the authorship to Montanus. Galland says the work was compiled "ex antiquioribus quæ apud ethnicos circumferebantur oraculis, atque ex iis quæ apud ipsos ex Hebræorum traditione manaverant: potissimum vero ex veteris et novi Fœderis codicibus." They are valuable as shewing the belief in the Divinity of Christ, as against the opposers of the Nicene Council: Ὦ ξύλον, ὦ μακαριστόν, ἐφ' ᾧ Θεὸς ἐξετανύσθη [vi. 26].

In a similar manner the well-known prediction of Virgil's Fourth Eclogue—

> "Ultima Cumæi venit jam carminis ætas;
> Magnus ab integro sæclorum nascitur ordo.
> Jam redit et Virgo, redeunt Saturnia regna;
> Jam nova progenies cœlo demittitur alto"
> [Virg. Bucol. Ecl. iv. 4]— was also appealed to by the Emperor Constantine at Nicæa as one of the prophetic evidences of Christianity; and the true key to such unconscious vaticinations of heathen writers is doubtless to be found in the Advent of Christ.

The earliest reference to the Sibylline oracles in Christian writers is in the Pastor of Hermas, who supposes he has seen the Sibyl in a vision, and in another vision is told that it is not the Sibyl, but the Church [Hermas, i. 4]. Justin Martyr speaks of her testimony that there will be a dissolution of all corruptible things by God. [Just. Mart. Apol. i. 20.] He also quotes a passage on the Unity of God, which he considered to be of greater antiquity than the time of Plato; and gives an account of what he had heard about the Sibyl when he had visited Cumæ. [Justin M. Orat. ad Græcos, xvi. xxxvii.] Tertullian and St. Clement of Alexandria also speak of her, and quote from the oracles, the Stromata of the latter containing more than forty Sibylline verses. Origen seems to defend their authenticity in his controversy with Celsus [Orig. Contr. Cels. v. 61]; St. Augustine, admitting their want of authority, justifies their use in controversy with the heathen; St. Jerome assigns some measure of inspiration to them, and his opinion was that which was generally accepted in later ages. [Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 57, ed. 1740. Alexandre, Χρησμοὶ Σιβυλλιακοί. Oracula Sibyllina, &c. Paris 1868.]

SIGN, in Hebrew ôth, in Greek σημεῖον, is used in Scripture in several senses, most of which may be resolved into the idea of "token" of coming events and of godlike power. The word "ôth" in Hebrew is no independent root of itself, but in accordance with Hebrew analogy it has much in common with roots in which any of the quiescent letters are combined with ת or with its co-ordinate ה. Thus in Numb. xxxiv. 10, to "mark out" is expressed by a verb formed upon the root âvah [אוה], while immediately before [ver. 7, 8] the same idea represents the root thâah [תאה]. This latter again is closely allied with thavah [תוה], to "make a mark," e.g. David "scrabbled on the doors" [1 Sam. xxi. 13], from which root comes "thau," the name of the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet; signifying a "mark" or "cross," such as was branded upon a camel or a bullock by its owner: the Phœnician character Thau being a simple cross †, from whence the Greek T was taken. It was as the "sign that should be spoken against" [Luke ii. 34]. The noun ôth, a "sign" [אות], is closely allied in sense with this latter word; but it is identical with the apocopate participial form derived by analogy from the root "âthath," "to come." Thus "coming events," in Hebrew "ôthioth" [אותיות], is nearly identical with "ôthoth" [אותות], "signs." Buxtorf, in his Concordance, repeats this latter word under the root "âthah," and translates it "signa venturorum." On his authority, therefore, we may assign to "ôth" the sense of a sign or token of coming events.

The word occurs [1] simply as a signal [Judg. xx. 38; Jer. vi. 1; Ezek. xxxix. 15; Matt. xxvi. 48], a memorial [Exod. xiii. 9; Deut. vi. 8; Josh. iv. 6; Isa. xix. 20, lv. 13], or a type. [Isa. viii. 18, xx. 3; Ezek. iv. 3, xii. 6, 11, xxiv. 24]. [2] It is the token of future good and acceptance [1 Sam. xiv. 10], as the bow in the cloud [Gen. ix. 12]; the sign of circumcision [Gen. xvii. 11; Rom. iv. 11]; the Sabbath, the sign to His people that "the Lord their God doth sanctify" them [Exod. xxxi. 13]. It denotes the heavenly bodies in their function of marking the recurring seasons [Gen. i. 14]; hence also it was supposed by the heathen that the various combinations of the heavenly bodies influenced or at least portended coming events [Isa. xliv. 25; Jer. x. 2]. It marks the earnest of future fulfilment of prediction [Isa. xxxviii. 7]; though the sign given to Ahaz [Isa. vii. 11] for his faithlessness was one that should not be verified in his day, but stand over for many generations till the Virgin should "conceive and bear a Son." The birth of the child should be no sign to Ahaz; but the discomfiture of the enemies of Judah should be an earnest to his generation of the sure fulfilment of the Messianic prediction. The "sure mercies of David" could never fall to the ground, and the continued preservation of the royal lineage should be an earnest of the future glory of the Virgin Mother. As an earnest of future accomplishment, the word is more usually connected with judicial vengeance [Numb. xvi. 38, xxvi. 10; Deut. xxviii. 46; 1 Sam. ii. 34; 1 Kings xiii. 3; Jer. xliv. 29; Ezek. xiv. 8; Rev. xv. 1], to which may be added the "sign of the prophet Jonas," who warned the Ninevites of threatened judgment [Matt. xii. 41, xvi. 4; Luke xi. 30]; and of the Son of Man [Matt. xxiv. 3, 30] at His Second Advent.

[1] There can be little doubt that parts of the third book are as old as the time of the Maccabees.

It is the token also of God's present power [Exod. iii. 12; Judg. vi. 17; Matt. xii. 38; Mark viii. 12], giving authority to His ministers [John ii. 18; 1 Cor. xiv. 22]; for which the carnal Jews were for ever craving [John vi. 30; 1 Cor. i. 22]. In the plural number it is usually combined with "wonders," and denotes those solemn preternatural occurrences whereby God has in every age arrested the slumbering spirits of men, and alarmed them with the terrors of approaching judgment. It also denotes in the same connection the miracles that were the credentials of God's ministers.

SIMONY. The corrupt acquisition of spiritual gifts, and traffic in holy things. As a sale of things not in commerce, whereof the sellers are not the masters, it is an infringement of natural right; and as a violation of the precept "freely give" [Matt. x. 8], it is contrary to the right Divine. By spiritual things must be understood whatever pertains to the worship of God and the salvation of men's souls; as the gifts of the Holy Spirit, sacraments, prayers, and the like. The crime is accurately defined by its Greek name, χριστεμπορεία.

Simony proper, that is, the original sin of Simon Magus, is the purchase of ordination, and is very different from the legal definition of the word as now given, a meaning acquired by degrees. But three kinds of simony are noticed by theologians: buying and selling of [1] spiritual gifts, and [2] preferments, and [3] ambitious usurpation of, and sacrilegious intrusion into, ecclesiastical functions, without due election or ordination. There are also, subjectively, three ways of committing the sin, "a manu," "ab obsequio," "a lingua;" or, in other words, "pecunia," "obedientia subjectionis," "favor adulationis."[1] The ancient penalties were the greater excommunication, the nullity of the simoniacal acts, and obligation of restitution.

The crime being thus strictly defined, it was necessary to except certain apparent violations, such as voluntary presents, offerings, or endowments, lawful payments for necessary maintenance, loss of temporal advantage by assuming a spiritual charge, and others. Amongst the councils which have condemned simony, the term of the canons being according to the various circumstances and forms of the crime prevalent, the following are noted: Chalcedon, second of Constantinople, second of Orleans, second of Braga, fourth, eighth and eleventh of Toledo, second of Nice, Rheims, Lyons, Placentia, Trullo, and many others. That of Trullo names fees for the Eucharist as a prevalent form of simony. The eleventh of Toledo speaks of fees for baptism and confirmation. The Apostolical canons of the third century forbade it: so did the laws of Justinian [A.D. 528]. Five years later we read that the crime was committed extensively with reference to papal elections, many scattering the goods of the Church in profuse bribes among the senators "ut postularentur in Romanum Pontificem" [Baronius, 533, xxxii.]. Hence a decree was passed by imperial authority, directed however rather against the laity than the clergy, the latter being left to ecclesiastical censures. This edict was engraved on marble, and placed in St. Peter's Church. The crime was also common in respect to other sees than that of Rome. St. Gregory, writing to Anastasius, Bishop of Antioch [A.D. 599], urges him, as the best offering he could make to God, to purge his church of simony.[2] He sent similar letters to many other bishops, as Vigilius, Bishop of Arles [bk. 9, Ep. 49], Ætherius, Bishop of Lyons [Ep. 50], and Desiderius, Bishop of Vienne [Ep. 48], shewing how general the practice had become. But it was in the eleventh and twelfth centuries chiefly that the mischief was at its height. A boy of twelve years old [A.D. 1033] was elected pope "intercedente thesaurorum pecunia." This was Benedict IX., afterwards deposed. The Emperor Henry II. made a decree on the subject [A.D. 1047], finding all Gaul and Germany "simoniacæ philargyriæ grassari cupiditatem;" and the bishops whom he assembled were unable to answer his questions, fearing for themselves. Guido, Archbishop of Milan [A.D. 1059], lamenting the prevalence of simony in his church, promised for himself and his successors utterly to renounce it. Gregory VI. [A.D. 1044] had risen to the pontificate by open simony: and while he lived at St. Maria Maggiore, Benedict IX. remained at the Lateran, and Silvester III. at St. Peter's, all intruded by simony. A vigorous opponent of this corruption arose in Hildebrand, afterwards Gregory VII. At a Council at Lyons the archbishop and forty-five bishops confessed themselves simoniacal, and were deposed. The acts of such prelates were not however invalid. Some heretics contended that the purchase of ecclesiastical preferment from lay princes was not simoniacal: and the re-action against this wholesale corruption, as in the case of the lapsed long before, taking the form of excessive severity, the heresy of the reordainers arose, who maintained that all acts of simoniacal bishops were absolutely invalid.

[1] Baronius, 1057, xxx.; quoting Peter Damianus.

[2] "Quia vero pervenit ad nos in Orientis Ecclesiis nullum ad sacrum ordinem nisi ex præmiorum datione pervenire: si ita esse vestra fraternitas agnoscit, hanc primam oblationem omnipotenti Deo offerat, ut a subjectis sibi ecclesiis errorem simoniaeæ hæreseos compescat" [Bar. 599, xi.].

The fortieth of our Canons of 1603 is directed against simony, as being "execrable before God:" and provides an oath to be taken personally by every one admitted to a benefice, that no simoniacal payment, contract, or promise, has been, or shall be made. The permission now granted by our law, on presentation to a benefice, to give a bond of resignation in favour of certain relatives of the patron, is of so recent a date as 9 Geo. IV.

The anomalies of the present law of the English Church are great. They may be reduced to these heads:—[1] It is legal for all to purchase an advowson, whether the living is vacant or not, but the next presentation to a vacant living would not be included in such purchase. [2] It is legal for a layman to buy a next presentation, if the living be full. [3] It is not legal for a clergyman to buy a next presentation, if the living be full. [4] It is not legal for any one to buy a next presentation if the living be vacant. [5] It is legal to give a bond of resignation for certain specified relatives of the patron. [6] It is not legal to give a general bond of resignation. [Moroni's Dizionario di Erudizione Storico-Ecclesiastica. Bingham's Works, 1855, ii. 5; vi. 319. Edinburgh Review, January 1854.]

SIN. The Anglo-Saxon "syn" is an old Norsk forensic term meaning justification for non-appearance, estopper, writ of error [J. Grimm, Stud. u. Krit. 1839, iii.], and hence error of judgment; or it is derived from the obsolete German term "suona," expiation, as marking that which needs atonement; the converse of the Hebrew חטאה, a sin-offering, from חטא, to sin [Lev. vi. 18, 23, Heb. Bible]. "Sin" and the converse term "holiness" are religious terms; the correlative expressions "Vice" and "virtue" referring to moral philosophy, and "crime" to state offence. "Sin" includes the meaning of several Hebrew and Greek terms, such as רשׁע, ἁμαρτία, forensic failure; שׁגגה, παράβασις, transgression of the boundary line of right and wrong; פשׁע, ἀνομία, lawlessness; רע, κακία, evil; and צור, stronger than all, ἀποστασία, revolt.

1. Sin, whether against a man's own self, his neighbour or his God, is the self-determined following of his own perverse will, in opposition to the holy and pure will of God [Free-Will]. It results in a direct way from the original depravation of our nature [Original Sin], and springs out of the imperious demands of self; it is a blind striving for present gratification in ways condemned by God. It is the evidence of satanic rebellion stirring the heart and driving it on to vicious thoughts and deeds by suggestions of evil. It is a centring of the corrupt heart upon itself, taking the form either of towering pride, or unscrupulous ambition, or lust of pre-eminence, regardless of the means used for attaining its object; or shewing itself in lower phases of self-seeking; sins of luxury and effeminacy; the natural instincts of malice and cruelty; the greed of gain, and abject thraldom to the world; all of which stand in eternal contrast with the holiness and goodness of the moral Governor of the world. Thus viewed, sin is no mere negative quality, consisting in a graduated absence of good; true as it may be in philosophy that the imperfection of the creature must involve the idea of Evil; for this gets no nearer to a final solution of the difficulty. "Against this immovable barrier of the existence of evil the waves of philosophy have dashed themselves unceasingly since the birth of human thought, and have retired broken and powerless, without displacing the minutest fragment of the stubborn rock, without softening one feature of its dark and rugged surface" [Mansel, Lim. of Relig. Thought, lect. vii.]. No definition of sin can be satisfactory that fails to set forth its positive evil. Kant defined sin to be a spontaneous declension from the moral law, an abnormal action of the springs of reason; Schleiermacher made it a traversing of the divine consciousness within the soul, by the individual consciousness, creative of remorse; but this resolves the nature of sin into a contingent antagonism, and fails to mark "the exceeding sinfulness of sin" [Rom. vii. 13]; that it is in itself essential evil in its most positive aspect; that it is the flesh lusting against the spirit, and breaking out into irregular desires and inordinate impulse, deceit and sensuality, as the "alter ego" of self, the efflux of the carnal heart (φρόνημα σάρκος) which is "not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be," so long as it continues unchanged; for until that exterminating change comes, sin, as positive evil, is the soul's death and a total alienation from the life of God. [Eph. iv. 17, 18, v. 8. Death.]

2. The universality of sin and the evil of concupiscence, the matrix of all moral evil in man, have been discussed elsewhere. [Evil. Original Sin.] Guilt, always present with sin, results from the freedom of the human will and its self-determining power; for without freedom of will there could be no moral guilt. It involves also punishment of sin both in this world and in the world to come. The seed of sin, as of the herb yielding seed, is in itself; for one unvarying phase of its punishment lies in the almost fatal necessity with which one sin brings in others in its train. It is the law of its being. This temporal retribution, arising by way of natural result from sin, shews how contrary it is in its nature to the holy and good law of God, and how surely it is tracked down by an inevitable Nemesis. [Conscience.]

Mortal and Venial Sin. In the analysis of sin for the purposes of dogmatic and moral theology, a distinction is made in the character of particular sins according to their nature, and to the disposition with which it is committed, some sin being said to be "mortal" (the usual Roman designation) or "deadly" (the usual English designation), and some "venial."

Sinaitic Codex

Mortal sin is a direct and wilful transgression against some Divine law by omission or commission; such as murder, theft, hatred, neglect of Divine worship. Venial sin is a transgression against the end of some Divine law, through inadvertence, or carelessness, or indulgence, such as idle words, "foolish talking, or jesting, which are not convenient" [Eph. v. 4], excess in eating, drinking, or sleeping, insufficient alms-giving, disregard of the minor charities of life.

Such a distinction is one of degree, not of kind; and thus a sin which is ordinarily classed as mortal may become venial through the particular circumstances by which it is accompanied; while a venial sin may also become mortal if it passes into a wilful habit, and is persisted in against the voice of conscience. The distinction also presupposes that all sins are, in themselves, hateful to God and deserving of His wrath; that there is no sin which is pardonable because of its degree, but that all sins, however venial, are pardonable only by an extension of Divine mercy to the sinner. As regards the punishment of sin, all theologians agree that unpardoned sin of every degree deserves it; but some consider that, while mortal sins are punishable eternally, venial sins are punishable by God's fatherly chastisements in this life. In the same way, as regards the pardon of sin, it is considered that while mortal sins are only forgiven through a direct act of absolution, venial sins are forgiven by renewal of grace, (especially in the Holy Eucharist); each mode of pardon pre-supposing a degree of penitence conformable to the degree of sin.

SINAITIC CODEX. A very ancient MS. of a part of the Old and the whole of the New Testament, in the possession of the Emperor of Russia. It was discovered by Tischendorf, so recently as February 4th, 1859, at the monastery of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai. On his first visit to that place, in 1844, he had found a few fragments of a codex of the Septuagint, almost destroyed, which were readily given to him. Other parts of what seemed the same MS. he was unable to acquire. On a second visit, in 1853, he could get no tidings whatever of this remainder, and on his return to Russia, he, in despair, published an account of what he had previously obtained, under the name of the Codex Frederico-Augustanus. This portion consisted of forty-three vellum leaves, and contained part of the first Book of Chronicles, the Books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, and part of Tobit. At a third visit, in 1859, Tischendorf was preparing for departure from the monastery, when the steward offered to shew him some specimens of a MS. of the LXX. in his possession. They were wrapped up in a cloth, and Tischendorf thus describes what followed:—"Aperui pannum et vidi quod ultra omnem spem erat. Erant enim codicis, quem antiquissimum omnium codicum Græcorum in membranis superstitum dudum declaraveram, reliquiæ uberrimæ, in quibus non modo quos anno 1844 e sporta protraxeram aliosque Veteris Testamenti libros sed etiam, quod longe gravissimum, Novum Testamentum, totum ne minima quidem lacuna deformatum, auctum vero plena Barnabæ epistola, ad quam prima Pastoris pars accedebat, superesse videbam." After a time Tischendorf thought of the happy suggestion that the MS. should be presented to the Emperor Alexander II. This was assented to by the monks, but the design was delayed in consequence of the death of the archbishop. The discoverer of the treasure was meanwhile allowed to take it away on loan, for purposes of collation, until the new archbishop should give the necessary consent for its presentation to the Emperor.[1]

This precious copy of the Scriptures is written in early uncial characters, on parchment, "non tam alba quam sufflava," made of antelopes' and sometimes of asses' skins. It consists of 345½ folios, of which 199 belong to the Old Testament, and 146½ to the New Testament, including under that head the Epistle of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas, the Epistle of Barnabas being in the original Greek throughout, which is not elsewhere the case. The leaves of the MS. are 13½ inches by 14⅞ inches in size, the Ammonian sections and Eusebian canons being marked in the margin in red ink. The books occur in the following order:—

A single folio of 1st Book of Chronicles.	Job.
Tobit (defective).	4 Evangelists.
Judith.	Romans.
1, 4 Maccabees.	1, 2 Corinthians.
Isaiah.	Galatians.
Lamentations.	Ephesians.
Joel.	Philippians.
Obadiah.	Colossians.
Jonah.	1, 2 Thessalonians.
Nahum.	Hebrews.
Habakkuk.	1, 2 Timothy.
Zephaniah.	Titus.
Haggai.	Philemon.
Zechariah.	Acts.
Malachi.	James.
Psalms.	1, 2 Peter.
Proverbs.	1, 2, 3 John.
Ecclesiastes.	Jude.
Song of Solomon.	Revelation.
Wisdom.	Epistle of Barnabas.
Sirach.	Shepherd of Hermas.

The Codex Frederico-Augustanus should be considered part of this codex. Excepting the single folio containing parts of the 9th, 10th, and 11th chapters of 1st Chronicles, it would stand at the beginning of the Codex Sinaiticus. The book of Tobit is in the two MSS. complete.

There is no note on this MS., nor any tradition among the monks as to the history of it. No travellers whatever before A.D. 1844 appear to have noticed any part of it. It has many features which tend to assign to it the earliest date of all known MSS. of the Septuagint and the New Testament. The Vatican and Alexandrian can alone compare with it, and the appearance of the Sinaitic Codex is said to be more ancient than even that of the Vatican Codex. Except in the poetical books, it is written in four columns to the page, a characteristic in which it is unique. Tischendorf considers that four different writers can be detected in different parts of the MS. The very numerous corrections are themselves written in uncial characters: and this occurs in no other codex. They were all written, moreover, before accents or breathings came into use. The Epistle of Barnabas and Pastor of Hermas are included as canonical, but these were excluded from the canon as early as the Council of Carthage [A.D. 397]. There is abundant internal evidence also of its extreme antiquity. The last chapter of St. Mark's Gospel contains only eight verses, and ends at the words ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ. Jerome and Eusebius are witnesses that this was the received version in their day; and the same feature is found in Codex B. Similar arguments are drawn from important readings at Matt. xiii. 35; Luke vii. 35; John vii. 8; and many other passages. We may therefore say that this codex answers to and embodies some of the very earliest forms of the sacred text with which we are acquainted. Other evidences of antiquity are detected in the rarity of its punctuation, and in the brevity of its titles.

1 The Archimandrite Porphyry, in 1856, and Major Macdonald, a little later, had noticed the MS. at Mount Sinai.

A fine facsimile edition of the Sinaitic Codex, in four great volumes, was published, at the expense of the Emperor of Russia, in 1862. [Tischendorf's Prolegomena. Scrivener's Collation. Journ. Sac. Lit., April 1863.]

SOCINIANISM. A development of the Arian heresy, originating with two Italians named Socinus in the middle of the sixteenth century. Its leading feature is the denial of our Lord's Divine Nature, with the belief that He was a typical and unique man, supernaturally conceived by a Virgin, divinely commissioned, and displaying in so unprecedented manner those higher characteristics of human nature which make it a shadow of the Divine Nature, that He was called (though He was not in the sense maintained by the Church) the Son of God.

This heresy was never fully developed, or at least never openly declared, by Lælius Socinus the elder, but was left in the form indicated above by his nephew, Faustus Socinus. Lælius Socinus [A.D. 1525-1562] was a native of Sienna, and associated with the reforming party at Venice in very early life. In the year 1547, he left Italy altogether, and after travelling in Switzerland, France, and England, settled down at Geneva, with letters of recommendation from Bullinger to Calvin. Socinus was already notorious for his scepticism as to the current theology of the reforming party, and he soon stated to Calvin certain doubts about the doctrines of Atonement and Satisfaction and the fact of the Resurrection. Calvin rebuked him, and shewed him sufficient discouragement to drive him to Zurich, where he revealed his scepticism still further, by putting forth questions respecting the doctrine of the Trinity, the Divinity of Christ, and the Personality of the Holy Ghost. Calvin denounced him as a follower of Servetus, whom he had just burned for heresy, and Socinus found it expedient to explain away his doubts. After enduring much trouble through the confiscation of his family property by the Inquisition, Lælius Socinus died at Zurich at the early age of thirty-seven, leaving his nephew Faustus, then aged twenty-two, to systematize his opinions. The same year in which the elder Socinus died [A.D. 1562], saw the publication of the "Dialogues" of Bernard Ochinus, his friend and ally at Zurich, and like himself, a native of Sienna. Ochinus had been vicar-general of the Capuchin order, much distinguished as a mission priest in Naples, Venice, and other Italian towns, and had been also confessor to Paul III. His Catholic Mysticism developed into Lutheran Solifidianism; and being regarded as a Protestant by the Inquisition he fled to Geneva in A.D. 1542. Ochine came to England during the Interim, and was received by Cranmer, who made him a prebendary of Canterbury; but driven thence in Queen Mary's days, he settled at Zurich. In his Dialogues he discussed the doctrines about which Socinus had expressed so much doubt, those of the Trinity, the Divinity of Christ, and the Atonement; and he always defeats the defender of those doctrines with great subtlety. In the nineteenth and twentieth dialogues he pronounces the doctrine of the Trinity to be untrue, and therefore not an article of faith. His advocacy of polygamy caused him to be driven from Zurich, and he died in A.D. 1564, at Slachau in Moldavia, having endeavoured in vain to settle in Poland. Sir Kenelm Digby says that "at the last he wrote a furious invective against those whom he called the three grand impostors of the world, among whom he reckoned our Saviour Christ, as well as Moses and Mahomet" [Digby's Observ. on Relig. Medici, p. 125, 5th ed. 1672].

The opinions of the elder Socinus, and of Ochinus, his more intellectual and courageous interpreter, spread much in Geneva, even in Calvin's time. Matthew Gribald, a Paduan lawyer, settled on property near Geneva, was saved from the fate of Servetus by recantation. John Paul Alciatus, also from Piedmont, escaped to Poland. John Valentine Gentilis also recanted and did penance when threatened with the stake, but when liberated fled to Poland; and, imprudently returning, was beheaded for heresy by the Calvinists at Berne on September 10th, 1566.

Faustus Socinus, the nephew of Lælius, does not seem to have been in any way conspicuous until about the year 1578. His earlier years were spent in some office at the court of the Duke of Tuscany; but at the date mentioned he is found holding a public disputation at Basle, on account of which he was obliged to leave Switzerland and take up his residence in Poland, the stronghold of the Anti-Trinitarian heresy. Here he moulded his heresy into its permanent form, professing to carry out the principles of Luther and Calvin to their logical terminus. The formula in which his tenets were stated was the Racovian Catechism, so called from Cracow, the capital of Poland, where it was first adopted.

This was dedicated to James I., but in the year 1652, it was publicly burned by order of Cromwell and the House of Commons. Socinus also wrote a treatise De Jesu Christo Servatore, which excited so much indignation at Cracow that he was in danger of his life from the populace of the city. He retired to the village of Luclavic, where he died in A.D. 1604. Half a century afterwards [A.D. 1658], all Socinians were ordered to be banished from Poland, and their heresy was made a capital crime; the edict being strictly carried out in the year 1661, after a three years' grace allowed them had expired.

The Socinian Christology represents Jesus as having been born of the Virgin Mary by a supernatural interposition of the Holy Ghost, in consequence of which He was a Man free from original sin and its evil inclinations, but only a man. He was outwardly anointed prophet, priest, and king at His baptism, by a material descent of a Divine force and efficacy upon Him in the form of a dove; but His full commission was given to Him during some one or more interviews which He had with God when rapt up into heaven, probably during the forty days in the wilderness. He was (shutting out any idea of Deity) the anointed Son of God, and was established in the fulness of His dominion by God, Who raised Him (not by any co-operation of His own) from the dead, and delegated to Him a supreme authority over men and angels. But in all this He is only a created being, and worship rendered to Him should only be given to Him as the representative of God, not as His own right. The Socinian system discards altogether the idea of union between Divine and Human Nature, alleging that the two are so infinitely removed from each other that union between them is an impossibility. Its later development does not recognise Christ as in any sense an object of worship, denies the supernatural origin which was attributed to Him by the earlier form of the heresy, and looks upon Him only as a very exalted saint and moral teacher. [UNITARIANISM. Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

SOLIFIDIANISM. The doctrine that faith is the whole of religion, such doctrine being preceded by an erroneous description of faith.

There are two forms of Solifidianism; one rests the whole of religion in the reception by the intellect of correct dogma, the other in an inner sense or persuasion of the man that God's promises belong to him. They who hold the latter are called also Fiduciaries. The name Solifidian is unfortunately, as in other cases,[1] taken from the incorrect language of those who hold the error. The faith which the Solifidian vaunts, and from which he has his name, is not faith at all; for, considering the nature of God's grace, and the character of His revelations, it follows that a true faith can be inferred only from its manifestation in good works. The source of good works is in the reception of grace, and correctness of theological belief is in the assent to revealed truth. But while there may be an intellectual assent to truth without the grace of faith (the devils believe and tremble), there can be no reception of grace without its issuing in good works, and no good works without the reception of grace.

It is easily seen, then, that Solifidianism, in both its forms, destroys the nature of faith. The former refers faith to the intellect alone, with a suppression or entire exclusion of the grace of God and the renewed will, and tends consequently to the superseding good works: the latter suppresses the action of the reason and understanding, and substitutes for a reasonable faith an unreasoning and groundless persuasion.

The former error may take the shape of a maintenance of orthodoxy, but it will be found (with scarcely any exception) that the pretended orthodoxy is an extremely deficient representation of Christian doctrine, omitting those doctrines which have most power to move the will, and striving to bring others within the comprehension of man's understanding. The more common form is that of advancing the doctrine of Justification by faith (which is probably stated inaccurately, and certainly misapplied through its separation from other doctrines) into the essence and substance of the Gospel. Such Solifidians teach that good works are not necessary to Justification [Bull, Harm. Apost. Diss. Post. xvii. 5]. The twelfth Article of Religion was designed to prevent this misapplication of the statement made in the eleventh.

The second form of Solifidianism generally connects itself with a one-sided or perverted view of the doctrine of Election. It advances the error that Christ died only for the elect, and that the elect cannot fall from grace; and it rests on an inward sense or persuasion of one's own election. It speaks of faith, but makes Fides the same as Fiducia. And Fiducia it makes to be, not the witness of the Spirit with our spirits, i.e. with an enlightened conscience and understanding, but a mere inner sense or persuasion, held without appeal to the conscience. Both forms of Solifidianism lead, it is evident, to Antinomianism. [FAITH. ASSURANCE. JUSTIFICATION. ELECTION. WORKS. Hammond, Of Fundamentals, ch. xii. xiii.].

SOUL. This word is used in Holy Scripture and elsewhere in three senses. First, it includes indefinitely the whole personality of a human being, as in the phrase, "that which every soul must eat" [Exod. xii. 16]: secondly, or such part of that personality as is not subject to the laws of matter, as when St. John writes, "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God" [Rev. vi. 9]: thirdly, or that part of a human being's incorporeal personality which is not spirit (the ψυχή as distinguished from the πνεῦμα), as in St. Paul's expression, "I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" [1 Thess. v. 23]. The first of these senses is simply a colloquial form, in which "soul" expresses the idea of a "living person," and need not be further noticed. It is the second and third meanings of the word which have a theological bearing.

[1] So Unitarians profess to hold the Unity of God, and thence have their name. But in truth the Unity cannot be held without the Trinity.

I. Ancient Ideas of the Soul as Incorporeal personality. Although the soul [נֶפֶשׁ Nephesh] is spoken of four hundred and fifty times in the Old Testament, it is rarely spoken of in the sense of a disembodied person. It is sometimes taken objectively as life, or subjectively as the living man, quâ living; sometimes as the conscious and willing part of our nature, that within us which thinks, desires, sorrows, rejoices, hates, and loves. In three of the Psalms there are prophetic allusions to the sojourn of our Lord's separated soul in Sheol [Psa. xvi. 10, xxx. 3, xlix. 15], and five or six other places may be quoted doubtfully as containing direct references to the separate state of ordinary human souls [Gen. xxv. 18; 1 Kings xvii. 21; Job xxiii. 13; Prov. xxiii. 14; Isa. lvii. 16; Ezek. xviii. 4]. The deutero-canonical books mention the soul about fifty times, and they speak of its separate existence after death in a more decisive manner, the souls of departed saints being declared to be "in the hands of God," so that "there can no torment touch them" [Wisd. iii. 1], the dead who are in the graves as having their "souls taken from their bodies" [Baruch ii. 17]; the "spirits and souls" of the righteous dead are called upon to praise the Lord [Song of the Three Child. 64], the corruptible body is said to "press down" the soul [Wisd. ix. 15], and death is spoken of as "the spirit going forth," and "the soul being received up" [Wisd. xvi. 14]. These passages were all written about the second century before our Lord, and by those who had been brought into contact with the philosophy of Alexandria.

In the New Testament also, the ψυχή is named about fifty times, and in very few cases with direct reference to its separate existence, though the instances in which it is so named are of a decisive character. Thus our Lord speaks of the soul being "required" [Luke xii. 20], of its being "lost" [Matt. xvi. 26], of its being in hell as well as the body [Matt. x. 48]: St. Paul prays that the soul as well as the spirit and the body may be preserved till Christ's Second Advent [1 Thess. v. 23], and speaks of "the dividing asunder of soul and spirit" [Heb. iv. 12]; while St. John mentions the living souls of some who had been "slain," and of some who had been "beheaded" [Rev. vi. 9, xx. 4]. The most general use of the word in the New Testament, however, has reference to man's moral responsibility, leaving the fact of his disembodied personality to be inferred, or assuming that it was universally believed in, and hence that no direct statement on the subject was needed.

And although we know little about early Jewish thought except from the Old Testament, we may reasonably believe that the ideas of Jews respecting the disembodied personality of man were at least on a level with those of contemporary heathen nations. There seems, however, to have been a danger of hero-worship associated with all pre-Christian ideas of disembodied heroes; and it is probable that while life beyond death was clearly revealed to the Jewish mind, the conditions under which the "dead" would live were purposely left unrevealed that there might be no temptation to the introduction of Polytheism under the disguise of an apotheosis of a Moses, a David, or a Solomon.

The Homeric pictures of disembodied souls probably represent the general notions of the world beyond the Jews before the rise of philosophy. In them death is the separation, from a body which turns to dust, of an attenuated essence of the body which still lives on. "When the soul has made its escape through the lips or the wound, it is not dispersed in the air, but preserves the form of the living person. But the face of the earth, lighted by the sun, is no fit place for the feeble, joyless phantom. It protracts its unprofitable being in the cheerless twilight of the nether world, a shadow of its former self, and pursuing the empty image of its past occupations and enjoyments. Orion, like the spectre of the North American hunter, is engaged in chasing the disembodied beasts, which he had killed on the mountains, over the asphodel meadow. Minos is busied in holding mock trials, and dispensing his rigid justice to a race that has lost all power of inflicting wrong. Achilles retains his ancient pre-eminence among his dead companions, but he would gladly exchange the unsubstantial honour, even if it were to be extended to the whole kingdom of spirits, for the bodily life of the meanest hireling. Nothing was more remote from Homer's philosophy than the notion that the soul, when lightened of its fleshly incumbrances, exerted its intellectual faculties with the greatest vigour. On the contrary, he represents it as reduced by death to a state of senseless imbecility. Alas! exclaimed Achilles, when the spirit of Patroclus had vanished, even in Hades there remains a ghost, and the image of the dead, but the mind is altogether gone. Tiresias alone, among the shades, enjoys a certain degree of mental vigour, by the especial favour of Proserpine. It is only after their strength has been repaired by the blood of a slaughtered victim that they recover reason and memory for a time, can recognise their living friends, and feel anxiety for those whom they have left on earth. While the greater part of the vast multitude that peoples the house of Hades merely prolongs a dreaming, vacant existence, a few great offenders are doomed to a kind of suffering most in accordance with the character of the infernal realms—to the torment of unavailing toil and never satisfied longings. A more tremendous prison, removed as far below Hades as earth is from heaven, was reserved for the audacious enemies of Jupiter; the abyss of Tartarus, fast secured with iron gates and a brazen floor. On the other hand, a few favoured heroes, instead of descending into Hades, were transported to a delicious plain, an island of ocean, cooled by perpetual breezes from the West, and exempt from every inclement change of the seasons."

[Bishop Thirlwall's Hist. of Greece, i. 223, ed. 1845].

Such were the early ideas of unphilosophical Polytheists respecting souls in their disembodied condition. As to its condition before death, there was, no doubt, a general opinion among mankind that the soul and the body were co-extensive, particular organs being the seat of particular emotions [Head. Heart], but the whole body being pervaded and penetrated by the soul as its vivifying and sentient companion.

II. Ideas of the Soul as part of a Trichotomy. The rise of philosophy led to more definite speculations on the subject of the soul. Its pre-existence was believed in by the Pythagoreans, who considered it to belong to a higher sphere of existence, and to be in the body as in a prison; and by the Egyptians, who accounted each soul as a fragment taken from one great soul of the world, dwelling for a time in a human body, and returning to a human body again after a thousand years of transmigrations through the bodies of the lower animals. [Pre-existence. Metempsychosis.] Its absorption into Deity by a process of nirvâna is the very ancient belief of a large part of the Eastern world. [Buddhism]. But none of these early theories included any real attempt to harmonize the idea of a future life with that of a present life, the living embodied "Ego" of which they had experience, with the living bodiless "Ego" of which they had no experience, but in which they believed.

Both Pythagoras and Plato considered the brain to be the seat of the νοῦς, and this opinion was the first step towards a more minute analysis of the nature of man than had previously been made, since it clearly required to be complemented by some intermediate link which was neither νοῦς nor σῶμα, and yet influenced the latter as something distinct from it. Accordingly Plato developed the theory of the soul into a trichotomy, the intellectual and undying part (τὸ λογιστικόν), the part in which the higher emotions arise, such as courage (τὸ θυμοειδές), and the sensuous or animal part (τὸ ἐπιθυμητικόν). This development was carried further by Aristotle, who took for his subject the whole nature of man, and divided it into body, soul, and mind, placing νοῦς in the same supreme position as that assumed for it by Plato, and making ψυχή to be the formative and animating principle by which the body and the mind are brought into, and maintained in, their living relation.

The trichotomy of St. Paul is a still further development, or is, it may be more correctly said, the truth towards which philosophy had been feeling its way. He divides our nature into body, soul, and spirit; the σῶμα being (of course) identical with that of the philosophers, but the πνεῦμα being an altogether new element, i.e. one hitherto unrecognised by those who had been developing the analysis of human nature. But the "soul" of St. Paul's system is not the mere animal principle of Aristotle's system. It is, rather, an union of the νοῦς and the ψυχή, of the reasoning faculty and the animating life; the πνεῦμα being a Divine principle belonging to a New Creation of supernatural being, which sprung from the Incarnation of Deity [Mediation], and was the gift bestowed in the new birth of human nature. [Spirit.] This trichotomy is the only psychological system which is reconcileable with the general statements of Holy Scripture respecting the soul; and it is the only key which will really unlock the mystery of the Fall and Restoration of mankind. It could not be known to the philosophers, because it had not been revealed by the Incarnation and the work of the Holy Spirit. And even when it was made known it still left the actual nature of the soul in almost as great an obscurity as before, though it unfolded a new and large chapter of knowledge and reasoning respecting its relation to the complete personality of human nature.

III. Materialist views of the Soul regard it as a function of the body instead of as a something which has a capacity for separate existence; the leading idea of Materialism on the subject being that consciousness and thought result from vibrations of brain-fibre, and not from the presence in the brain or in the man at large of any incorporeal or immaterial entity. The immortality of the soul, on such a theory, becomes a contradiction of terms, since the body is not immortal, and that which is only a function of the body cannot exist after the organ with which it was associated has ceased to exist.

There is, doubtless, a nucleus of truth in such ideas. There is, it is certain, a very intimate relation between the emotions and acts of the mind and the physical accompaniments of those acts and emotions. Shame brings the blood to the cheeks, fear drives it in upon the heart, mental excitement quickens the beat of the pulse, softening of the brain is accompanied by mental imbecility; and there are many other phenomena in which the reaction of the body and soul on each other may be observed.

No observation, however, has ever disclosed that these phenomena are anything else than the reaction of two separate, though associated, entities: and the most subtle theories of Materialism are obliged to presuppose a something in the shape of a principle of life before those theories can be made to walk. Take away that principle and materialistic theories as to mental operations have lost their fulcrum. Let that principle be granted and some theory of the soul as a distinct entity becomes a necessity.

Such materialistic theories are also met by instinctive feeling and by weighty evidence. [1] There is a voice within every one which speaks the universal language "Non omnis moriar:" and that which tells of a future incorporeal existence of the Ego tells also that the Ego of the present must be something more than that which chemical affinities will shortly dissolve and dissipate. [2] There is evidence, too, that the mental faculty can retain its full power and capacity for action when the body is so battered and mutilated that scarcely any other trace of life is observable, and even after severe injuries, and consequent disorganization, of the brain itself. [3] The few but weighty testimonies of Holy Scripture to the separate existence of the soul are, moreover, beyond the reach of confutation, and can only be met by airy contradictions: especially the most weighty of all, the testimony of our Lord's own death and resurrection; the separation, that is, and the reunion, of His Body and His Soul. [DEATH and RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.] [4] Nor, lastly, must it be overlooked that the whole moral teaching of Holy Scripture, of the Christian Church, and of all shades of Theism, is founded on the idea of a conscious and responsible soul.

On the other hand, we know nothing as to the laws under which that which is not material exists, and hence caution is necessary in speaking about the soul as a separate entity. Origen believed that God alone is pure Spirit, and not a few of the Fathers inclined to the belief that the soul is an ethereal substance. [CREATIONISM. TRADUCIANISM. PRE-EXISTENCE.]

SPECIES. [ACCIDENTS. TRANSUBSTANTIATION.]

SPINOZISM. The Tractatus Theologico-Politicus of Spinoza, the source of German Rationalism, was published during his lifetime [A.D. 1632-1677], its principles being drawn from the Moreh Nevochim of Maimonides. His Ethics only appeared after his death, but with a finish of all the principal ideas that left little for the "limæ labor" of editorship. It is a system cold, clear, and polished as the lenses which he ground for a livelihood. Had not a few admiring friends caused it to see the light, Baruch (Benedict) Spinoza would never have been known to fame.

His predecessor, Descartes, taught him to receive nothing as substantive truth that is not based on clear and distinct ideas. This suggested geometrical forms—"le démon de la géometrie," says Saisset; he treated even the soul and its affections as though they were lines and superficies and solids [Eth. iii. præf.]. Experience was of no value with him; Baconian induction a purposeless waste of time and labour;—as applied to psychology it could only supply a romance of the soul "historiolam animæ" [Epp. ii. 22, vol. ii. ed. Saisset].

I. The whole of the Spinozist theory is deduced from the idea of one Infinite and Perfect Being, termed by him Substance, though he gives no adequate definition of the idea to be conveyed by it. Substance has its attributes, without which it would be a mere mental abstraction. In a subjective sense substance is indeterminate; for there can be no negation in its nature, and that which is determinate has its limits fixed by qualities that do not belong to it, and which it excludes. But in an objective sense substance is determinate, as being defined by attributes that are of the very essence of substance and are inseparable from its nature. As substance is absolutely infinite, so are its attributes infinite, though in a relative sense; for if any attribute were absolutely infinite it would be wholly identical with infinite substance. Each attribute then is perfect and infinite in itself; but with an infinity that is only relative as compared with substance. Thought is an attribute of substance; thought then is infinite. Extension is another attribute of substance, and, like thought, of relative infinity; both are perfect but of a determinate perfection. Substance alone is infinite in itself, perfect in itself, absolute unity. And its attributes are infinite, for if their number were defined substance would be circumscribed, and the positive would be annihilated by the negative. That the finite should define the infinite would be a confusion of terms. They are infinite, yet an infinity of attributes infinitely produced could never adequately express the infinite essence of substance.

Thought is here the merest abstraction, and by no means to be accepted as thought individualized, so to speak, in any phase of extension. Spinoza, though he allows that only two positive attributes are within man's cognizance,[1] thought and extension, still gives the key-note to Hegel and later Pantheists in saying that the soul of man can form an adequate conception of the Infinite and Eternal Substance [De. An. Prop. 47].

In the system of Spinoza, substance, attribute, and mode, are the correlatives of being, reality, and deity. His definitions are best given in his own terms. "[1] I understand by 'substance' that which is in itself, and which is conceived by itself, i.e. that of which conception is formed without the necessity for any other conception; [2] I understand by 'attribute' that which reason conceives in substance as constituting its essence; [3] I understand by 'mode' the affections of substance; or that which exists in some other thing, and is conceived by that same thing; [4] I understand by 'God' an absolutely infinite Being, i.e. substance consisting of an infinity of infinite attributes, each of which expresses an eternal and infinite essence" [Eth. i. Def. 3, 4, 5, 6]. Elsewhere these definitions are condensed into one theorem [De Deo. Prop. 16]: "It is the nature of substance to develope itself necessarily by an infinity of infinite attributes which are themselves infinitely modified." Necessarily, for his Deity is without a will, which as a determinate mode would belong to the subordinate condition of the "natura naturata." In the Deity there is nothing else than infinite activity, which relatively to substance is absolutely indeterminate, and constitutes the "natura naturans." That the Deity should be the origin of any final cause is in the eyes of Spinoza an absurd idea, a chimera and wholly anthropopathic. Necessity is the sole spring of Divine action; there is no moral quality of any kind in the Deity; such notions are mere human distinctions, which arise out of common ways of thinking. Everything is of its kind good, because everything is of necessary consequence. The good and the bad are on the same level before God. God can neither love nor hate, and to desire to be loved by the Deity is a grotesque and childish superstition.

[1] Man, he says, only speaks of God in human terms, and it is only natural for him so to express himself. "I believe," he says, "that if a triangle had the faculty of speech it would in like manner say that God was eminently triangular; a circle would say that He was altogether round; and in this way each would ascribe its own attributes to God; and making itself similar to God, every other figure would seem to it a deformity" [Ep. 47]. Elsewhere he says, "Men may speak of the intelligence of the Deity, but there is no more relation between that attribute and human intelligence than between the constellation Canis and the baying dog of earth" [Eth. Prop. 17, Schol.].

Although an infinity of attributes pertain to substance, only two are adequately known to man; Thought and Extension, "Deus est res extensa:" yet he allows the Divine Nature to be indivisible; for he draws a distinction between finite extension which is Body, and infinite extension which can alone harmonize with the Divine Being. God is no specific extension, but extension in Himself; immensity without movement and without parts. Thought is in a similar way absolute, as extension is absolute. It is in its own nature infinite, and capable of an indefinite degree and intensity; there is no limit to it in any direction, and every determinate power of thought contains within itself the germ of infinity. This infinity is the measure of Divine thought and is absolute. Now, how does the Divine Being exercise this attribute of absolute and perfect thought. In the solution of this question lies the whole pith of Spinozism.

The Absolute is substance with its attributes, such as thought and extension. Nature is a congeries of matters, subject to the accidents of movement and succession, that are in perpetual flux upon the stream of time; souls and bodies are vital principles that have no substantive being, but fleeting modes that impress their character on the attribute of extension. The Deity and Nature are one inseparably. The one cannot exist without the other. They constitute cause and effect, substance and modal existence, the Infinite and the finite. The Deity as "Natura naturans" is identical with the universe or "Natura naturata." All is Nature, all is God, one and indivisible. It is thus that the Divine thought exercises itself. It fills all things, and is the one universal Intelligence, thought substantive and determinate; thought creative and create; thought subjective and objective, absolute and relative. Thought comprises every form of being. That which extension is formally, thought is subjectively, and in this sense thought is all things. Its action also is reflective; absolute thought is the object of thought; so that thought also is represented by its idea.

The idea of extension is the idea of all its modes. These modes are souls and bodies. The idea of extension therefore embraces the aggregate of souls and bodies; it is the soul of the bodily world, an universal soul from which all others emanate; it is an infinite ocean of souls and ideas, each of which is a stream, each thought a wave. But this idea of extension is itself an individual emanation from a principle that contains an infinity of such emanations; it is a stream of a yet more boundless ocean. Thought and extension are singled out from the rest as attributes that alone are within man's cognizance, but there is an infinity of other attributes. The idea of God is not merely the soul of the universe in which we have our being; it is the soul of that infinity of universes which the teeming nature of substance is for ever putting forth. If we term it the soul of the world, we must bear in mind that the universe, as known to us, is but as a grain of dust in comparison with all that truly exists. The idea of extension enfolds within itself our universe, but the same idea comprises within itself an infinity of others. God comprehends within His thought this indefinite system of numberless universes; and His thought is inherent in His substance, the ultimate entity that envelopes all.

II. Spinoza denied man to be a free agent, and he maintained also with a hardy consistency that he is in no respect a moral being responsible for his actions. This is an idea of perpetual recurrence. Men may accept as facts if they will the freedom of the will and the intrinsic difference of good and evil; but this he said is altogether wrong—a logical necessity overrules all. Everything is governed by general laws; even the Divine Being is bound by them, and therefore also man. Yet this system, diametrically opposed as it is to all notions of morality, leads back to approved results by a strictly metaphysical train of reasoning. All is severely logical. The Divine attributes are all perfect; and their modes, each according to its degree, express the absolute perfection of the self-existent in decreasing ratio. Relative as well as absolute perfection has a part in his system. Perfection, as being identical with being, follows its gradations. In the life of man utility is that which is productive of joy and eliminative of sorrow; it is therefore his good. Joy is an advance to higher perfection as desire accomplished; sorrow is a lapse from perfection as desire thwarted. Now substitute "being" for "perfection," and that which augments the scope of being causes joy, while that which lessens it in a direct ratio produces sorrow. Hence arise relative perfection and imperfection, good and evil; they are capable of measure and comparison; but they are as totally disjoined from the ideas of free choice, virtue and vice, as if mere qualities of vegetable or mineral life were under discussion.

The soul also has its present destiny of good or ill; but the beaten path of morals is treated by Spinoza with disdain, and a more excellent way, as he imagines, is indicated in his relative perfection of human life, the necessary increase or diminution of man's substantive being just now indicated. The great law of our being is its continued development; but however intense our efforts may be they have no moral quality. There are two ways of fulfilling the allotted end of being, by the instinctive action of the body or of the soul. In the first case the brute appetites are indulged through the incentive of passion; in the latter desire urges the soul forward, with reason at the helm. Thraldom to the sense and fancy yields but a momentary gratification; but reason makes its forecast of the future, and since by virtue of its origination it has a strain of eternity in it, the soul is possessed with a still more powerful yearning for future than for present good. Hence the wisdom that leaves nothing for chance, prudently abstains from all that may impede, and earnestly pursues all that may advance, its hope of solid and durable happiness. The indulgence of sense is a hopeless bondage, the discipline of reason is emancipation. The most reasonable life is the most perfect, and by giving a fuller proportion to being, it is the happiest. Reason is homogeneous with the being of the soul; but this is a Divine idea, and of the essence of thought; hence the more thoughtful the soul, the more true to its nature, the more full is the development of its being, and the more perfect its happiness. A soul enfranchised from the dominion of the senses, and dignified by reason, abounds the most with adequate ideas, that is, it is cognizant in a higher degree of the nature of itself and of every other thing. To possess this knowledge is to be gifted with a connected chain of ideas, of which the last link is God; it is to think without ceasing of God, and to have an intuition of all things in Him. To live in the active enjoyment of being is to have every desire engrossed by one single thought, the hope of attaining to God; this it is to love God and to dwell in Him. It is thus that Spinoza deduces, even from his necessitarian principles, lessons of virtue.

In a certain diffusive sense Spinoza believed in the soul's immortality. The soul as a modal efflux from the attribute of thought can never perish. The body, indeed, as a mode of extension, will for ever form a part of space; but the soul, as the idea of the body, lives in the Divine Being so far as it is itself made up of ideas adequate to that Being; but its accidents that depend upon bodily existence perish; such as memory, imagination, passions, prejudice, errors, and all that is merely suited to an ephemeral and shifting condition of life: every idea also that is inadequate to the Divine thought shall suffer annihilation. Reason alone subsists eternally; and those souls which have cast aside its dictates and lived by sense will suffer a proportionate extinction of their being. The soul that is guided by right reason has an indefeasible right to a happy immortality. The drawback to this theory is destructive to it; there is no room in Spinoza's scheme for free agency. Therefore there is no morality in it. The bad are of necessity bad, the good by the same inflexible law are virtuous.

III. The Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, in which the religious ideas of Spinoza are set forth, is very different from the Ethics, which have more in common with the Cartesian than any other philosophy. But the treatise is of the School of Cordova; its principles being derived from Maimonides, who is frequently quoted, the very words of the Moreh Nevochim being used. Voltaire and Rousseau, agreeing enthusiastically with this work, rejected the theory of the Ethics [Saisset, Descartes, 301]. "Tu te trompes Baruch," is the exclamation with which it was greeted at Verney [Voltaire, Dict. de Phil. art. Causes Finales]. In either case, however, Spinoza gave so wide a development to the principles of his teacher, that his system was virtually his own. The whole work of religion is summed by him as the Love of God and the Love of Man. Human affections are intensified by being shared with others. The good that the virtuous desire for themselves they desire also for others, and this desire bears a direct ratio to the degree of their love for God. These affections "make all kindred one." Such a form of religion as this, he says, is universal; it needs no historical and traditional indoctrination, it consists in no dead ceremonies, but in living works of love; and it generates its own reward in the higher perfection to which it is continually struggling through love. Those, on the contrary, who are untrue to this law of their nature, find their punishment in th loss of all that is worthy of desire, in slavery to the flesh, and a degenerating condition of the soul that is aggravated with every day.

The only use of the Bible in Spinoza's view is to teach this love of God and man; it can do nothing else. It may edify the heart, it cannot instruct the understanding. "I have never learned from it anything," he says, "with respect to the Divine attributes" [Ep. to Blyenberg, iii. 409]. It is no help to philosophers and metaphysicians, but only to simple men; and to women and children. Miracles he wholly rejected; whether true or false, their assertion is in direct contravention to the orderly laws of nature, which have a necessary course that can never be interrupted. The light in which he regarded revelation is exactly that of the Deistical writers. Man needs no other revelation than his own reason; there is no other prophetic spirit. The supernatural has no place whatever in his system. Where everything is nature the supernatural can have no existence. The prophets were men of strong imagination, but rude of intellect; they were enthusiasts and knew not what they said. Confucius and Socrates, Zoroaster and Plato, stand on the same level, as regards authority, with Moses and Isaiah, Peter and Paul. Even to Mahomet he assigns a scarcely inferior rank, and a Turk if he worships God in a spirit of brotherly love is filled with the Spirit of God, and is sure of an immortality of happiness [Ep. to Isa. Orobio, iii. 426, and to Alb. Burg. 451]. The assertions contained in his private letters are of a much more pronounced character than those of his published treatise.

IV. He had no Christology. His Christ was a mere man, like any other nature compounded of thought and extension in modal form; yet he allowed the Saviour to be not merely the organ of the Divine Thought, but the very expression of it; and what he saw and knew of the Divine Nature he comprehended in its height and in its depth, and truly and adequately set forth in his teaching. Thus He was the very wisdom of God[1] clothed in our nature as the man Christ Jesus [Tr. Th. Pol. p. 23]. Maimonides had said as much of Moses [Moreh Nevochim, ii. 277, ed. Munk]. Both the earlier and the more modern

[1] De æterno illo Filio Dei, hoc est Dei æternâ sapientiâ, quæ sese in omnibus rebus, et maxime in mente humana, et omnium maxime in Christo Jesu manifestavit, longe aliter sentiendum [Ep. xxi. ad Oldenb. i. 510].

Jew meant only that they regarded the object of their praise as the wisest of men. Christ was not so much a prophet as the very mouthpiece of the Deity; and His utterances are the heritage of the whole human race, whose being may be advanced to the highest dignity of which it is capable through Him. In his letters he speaks more unguardedly with respect to the union of two Natures in one Person.[1] The doctrine of the Incarnation, he there says, is as strange to him as if any one were to tell him of a round square [Ep. to Oldenb. ii. 367 and 373]. The Resurrection of Christ he wholly denied, "Christi passionem mortem et sepulturam tecum literaliter accipio; ejus autem resurrectionem allegorice" [Ep. ad Oldenb. p. 419].

V. His political theory is, notwithstanding his disclaimer, copied in its principal features from Hobbes. [Deism.] Each individual being an efflux from the Deity, his power is derived from the Divine, and his rights are co-ordinate only with his power of asserting them. "Fish are made to swim, and the larger have a capacity for devouring the smaller; they exercise their natural right therefore by living in water and devouring one another." It is his picture of society in its natural condition. In his moments of relaxation he illustrated his theory by entangling flies in the spider's web, while he enjoyed the terror and agonies of his wretched victim. The power of the strong, from self-interested motives, enforces order in the body politic. This power consolidated under a sense of general interest is the power of the state, and from hence emanate justice and the rights of property. The civil governor, as with Hobbes, is invested with more than Papal power. "Religion," he says, "of whatever complexion, whether natural or revealed, is only binding so far as it pleases the sovereign power to impose it; it is only by means of that power that God reigns upon earth." His advice to the successor of an assassinated monarch, instead of exhorting to good and rational government of his subjects, suggested deeds of vengeance; yet it was to be a worthy vengeance, not thirsting to shed the blood of his subjects, but approving the acts of his predecessor, holding on the same course and rivalling him in tyranny. As in his moral theory Spinoza first demolishes the idea of man's responsibility, reduces virtue and vice to the same neutral equality, and then shews how human nature is capable of the highest dignification, so in his political theory he first denies all individual right, which he delivers over to the state, bound hand and foot, and then proceeds to declare that the state is subject to a necessary condition, without which it could neither continue nor exist; the condition of obeying in its own self the laws of reason.

The great object of his entire moral scheme, whether ethical or political, results from the πρῶτον ψεῦδος of his entire tone of thought, a total elimination of the idea of individual responsibility and individual force of character. It was in keeping with his life of abstracted seclusion and sedentary occupation, brooding over his grinding apparatus and perverted thoughts. "Read the biography of Spinoza," says Saisset in words of much eloquence, "and tell me whether such a man could comprehend force and individuality and life. Doubtless he had a vigorous intellect, but how perverse a spirit was his! How feeble and powerless the springs of life! Contemplate this lone being without family, without country, without a hearth, ensconced in the depth of his cell, occupied in weaving the web of his abstraction, while his hand mechanically polishes up his lenses. He has no wants, no passions. He lives on a morsel of bread and a little milk. His amusements are childish. His virtues have been cried up, and not without reason, but they were the virtues of monasticism, chastity, poverty, and resignation. Of active and prolific virtues there is not a trace. He fears men more than he loves them."

Lessing first spoke of Spinoza with a reverential regard, and, in consequence, Mendelssohn, the ideal sage worked up by Lessing into "Nathan the Wise," found much difficulty in vindicating his friend from Jacobi's charge of Pantheism. Goethe declares that Spinoza, Shakespeare, and Linnæus, were the three master-spirits that formed his mind. Even religious Mysticism has been tinged with Spinoza's Pantheism. Fenelon is not free from it, and Novalis found that it could harmonize with the yearnings of a pious mind. Schleiermacher would have canonized Spinoza. German philosophers, Fichte pre-eminently, as also Schelling and Hegel, with his satellite Strauss, have varied on his theory rather than struck out any entirely new path of their own. [Ritter, Gesch. d. Ph. xi. Cousin, Introd. à l'Hist. de la Phil. Tennemann. Saisset, Introd. Œuvres de Spinose, Paris, 1862; and Essai de Ph. Relig.; also Précurseurs et disciples de Descartes. Auerbach, Spinosa ein Denkerleben. Foucher de Careil, Refut. de Spin. par Leibnitz. Helfferich, Spin. u. Leibnitz. Van der Linde, Spinosa. Maret, Panthéisme. Mill's Pantheistic Princ. Orelli, Spinosa, nebst einem Abrisse d. Heg. u. Schell. Phil. Saintes, Spinosa. Schaarschmidt, Descartes u. Spinosa. Christlieb, Erigena. Jacobi, Bd. iv. Dr. S. Clarke. Bayle. Kirchen Lexicon, art. Spinosa. Herzog, art. Pantheismus. Franck, La Cabbale, pref. Milman, H. Jews, iii. 374, f. The newly discovered treatise, De Deo et Hom. Supplem. ad Spin. op. Amstelod. 1862. A list of refutations, too long for insertion here, is given in the Biographie Universelle, art. Spinoza.]

SPIRIT. That element of human nature which was lost in the Fall, and which is restored by God the Holy Spirit in His work of sanctification.

The New Testament writings make a marked distinction between the human soul (ψυχή) and the human spirit (πνεῦμα), as also between the man quâ soul (ψυχικός) and the man quâ spirit (πνευματικός). Thus, St. Paul says, "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" [1 Thess. v. 23]. In the Epistle to the Hebrews also, the Word of God is said to be "quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit" [Heb. iv. 12]. Again, St. Paul contrasts the ψυχικός, the man who cannot receive τὰ τοῦ πνεύματος τοῦ Θεοῦ, with the man who can receive them, whom he calls πνευματικός [1. Cor. ii. 14, 15]: he speaks of "The Spirit bearing witness with our spirit" [Rom. viii. 16] in such a manner as to shew some analogy between the human spirit and the Divine Spirit: and he often sets the "flesh" and the "spirit" in verbal opposition to each other, especially in the seventh and eighth chapters of his Epistle to the Romans, and in the fifth of that to the Galatians. A contrast of a similar kind is also made between the first and the second Adam, the first Adam being said to be made made "a living soul" (ψυχὴν ζῶσαν), the second or last Adam "a life-giving Spirit" (πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν): the words ψυχικὸς and πνευματικὸς being immediately afterwards applied with a distinctive force to each person respectively [1 Cor. xv. 45, 46].[1]

[1] "These epistles are the most curious, perhaps the most trustworthy depositories of Spinoza's opinions. They were published in his lifetime. They answer the objections raised by his friends, men of great acuteness, to the views maintained in the Tractatus Theologico Politicus" [Milman, H. Jews, iii. 379, 4th ed.].

It has been a peculiar feature of English religion, and of many English theologians, to undervalue the Presence of God Incarnate as the means of human sanctification, and to speak of the work of the Holy Ghost in such a manner as to imply that although He never became united to human nature by Incarnation, yet there is some means by which He comes into direct union with it and "dwells in" each sanctified person.[2] Hence there has been a tendency to interpret the word πνεῦμα as referring to God the Holy Spirit wherever it is used in association with the idea of sanctification; and the tripartite nature of perfected human nature has been altogether ignored, the "spirit" of man being taken as a synonym for the "soul" of man, or for that portion of his nature which is not corporeal. A more exact theology recognises the Incarnation of God as the means by which God and man were brought into union in the Person of the Son of God [INCARNATION]; the mediation of Christ as the means by which that union is realized in the persons of Christians [MEDIATION]; the Holy Spirit as that Person of the Blessed Trinity Who effected the union in our Lord by a miraculous Conception, and Who affects it in Christians by the work of sanctification; and the human "spirit" as the result of the Divine Spirit's work,—the "building up" of a "new man," the development of Christ's "indwelling" in the soul.

Our Blessed Lord was often called "The Spirit," and "The Spirit of God," by the earlier Christian writers; but it seems as if the designation was used distinctively of His Divine Nature. Thus Ignatius wishes the Church of Smyrna happiness through "the Immaculate Spirit, the Word of God" [Ignat. Ad Smyrn. init.]: Hermas says "the Son is the Holy Spirit, and the servant is the Son of God" [Herm. Simil. v. sec. 5]: the Epistle of St. Barnabas reads, "He also Himself was about to offer up for our sins the vessel of the Spirit that the type of Isaac might be fully accomplished" [Ep. Barnab. vii.]. So Tertullian also opens his treatise on Prayer with the words "The Spirit of God, and the Word of God, and the Reason of God,—Word of Reason, and Reason and Spirit of Word—Jesus Christ our Lord, Who is both the one and the other, has determined for us a new form of prayer" [Tertull. De Orat. init.]. Such expressions seem generally to refer to our Lord's Divine Nature, and are considered by Bishop Bull to be analogous with Mark ii. 8; John vi. 63; Rom. i. 3, 4; 1 Tim. iii. 16; Heb. ix. 14; 1 Pet. iii. 18-20. He adds also that it was a form of expression which continued to be used even after the rise of the Arian and Macedonian heresies, which might seem to have rendered it inexpedient and dangerous as tending to confuse men's ideas about the second and third Persons of the Trinity.

But it is probable that even when such ex-

[1] This antithesis may be compared with one in the Old Testament: "the spirit [πνεῦμα, Heb. ruach] should fail before Me, and the souls [πνοὴν, Heb. neshomoth] which I have made" [Isa. lvii. 16]: it being also remembered that πνοὴ ζωῆς is the Divine gift by which man became ψυχὴν ζῶσαν [Gen. ii. 7]. Job also speaks of the "πνεῦμα [Heb. ruach] in man" in connection with "the πνοὴ [Heb. neshoma] of the Almighty" [Job. xxxii. 8].

[2] It is a popular idea that there is a great deal about the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the soul to be found in the New Testament: but this idea is dissipated by an examination of the New Testament itself. There are about sixty-four passages in all which express in some form or other the idea of God abiding with Christians in the sense of indwelling, which can be thus classified:—

I. Texts relating to the indwelling of God the Father, or of the whole Blessed Trinity:—Acts xvii. 28; 1 Cor. viii. 6; 1 Cor. xiv. 25 [cf. Isa. xlv. 14; Zech. viii. 23]; 2 Cor. vi. 16; Eph. iv. 6; 1 Thess. i. 1; 1 John ii. 24; 1 John iv. 4; 1 John iv. 12; 1 John iv. 13; 1 John iv. 15; 1 John iv. 16.

II. Texts relating to the Indwelling of God the Son:—John i. 14; John vi. 56; John xv. 4; John xv. 5; John xv. 6, 7; John xvii. 23; John xvii. 26; Rom. viii. 10; 2 Cor. v. 17; 2 Cor. xiii. 4; 2 Cor. xiii. 5; Gal. ii. 20; Gal. iv. 19; Eph. i. 4; Eph. i. 17; Phil. iii. 9; Col. i. 27; Col. ii. 6; Col. ii. 7; Col. ii. 10; 1 John ii. 5; 1 John ii. 6; 1 John ii. 24 [cf. 1 John i. 1]; 1 John ii. 27; 1 John ii. 28; 1 John iii. 6; 1 John iii. 9; 1 John iii. 24 (bis); 1 John iv. 13; 1 John v. 20.

III. Texts relating to the Indwelling of God the Holy Ghost:—Luke xi. 13; John xiv. 17; Rom. viii. 9; Rom. viii. 11 (bis); 1 Cor. iii. 16; 1 Cor. vi. 19; Gal. iv. 6; Eph. iii. 16; 2 Tim. i. 14.

Taking these several texts in order it will be found that they may be again classified thus:—

Indwelling in the Church.	Indwelling in individual persons.
I.] 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10,	11, 12,
II.] 13, 22, 29, 30, 31, 32,	14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43,
III.] 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53.	None.

These references shew the very noteworthy result that nearly all allusions to the indwelling of God in individual persons are associated with God Incarnate, and that all allusions to the indwelling of God the Holy Ghost are to His indwelling in the corporate Church pressions were used with reference to our Lord's Divine Nature they were used with reference to the subjective relation of that nature to man—that is, to Its operation through Its Incarnation—rather than in an objective sense. It is clearly thus that St. Paul speaks of the "Last Adam" as a "life-giving Spirit" [1 Cor. xv. 45]. It is in the same sense, doubtless, that St. Cyprian writes, when speaking of the mission of our Lord, "He is the Power of God; He is the Reason; He is the Wisdom and Glory; He enters into a Virgin, and being the Holy Spirit He puts on flesh, and God is united to man. This is our God, this is Christ; Who, as the Mediator of the two, puts on man that He may lead men to the Father. What man is, Christ was willing to be, that man may also become what Christ is" [Cypr. De Idol. vanit. 11]. Similar language, again, is used by Irenæus. "For if He seemed to be man and yet was not man, He did not truly remain, what in truth He was, Spirit of God:" since he adds shortly afterwards, "In the end, the Word of God, and Spirit of God, united with the ancient substance of Adam's formation, and formed a living and perfect man, receptive of the perfect Father, that as in the natural Adam we all died, so in the spiritual Adam we may all be made alive" [Iren. Adv. Hæres. v. 2, 3].

Our Lord, God Incarnate, seems thus to have been designated "the Spirit," and "the Spirit of God," with reference to that view of His Person and work which looks towards the "restoration of the creature" by means of union with Him. Accordingly we find Tatian speaking of the "Heavenly Logos" as a Spirit emanating from the Father of Whom He was begotten. Man, also, is spoken of as being made immortal by Him through participation of His Divine Nature; but as losing immortality by separation from the Spirit [Tatian, ad Græc. vii.]. "We recognise," the same writer says, "two kinds of spirit, one of which is called the soul, but the other is greater than the soul, being the Image and Likeness of God" [Ibid. xii.]. "If the soul continues alone it tends downward towards matter, and dies with the flesh; but if it is united with the Divine Spirit it is no longer helpless, but ascends thither where the Spirit leads it" [Ibid. xiii.]. "It becomes us, then, to seek for what we once had, but have lost, to seek to unite the soul to the Spirit, and to strive after union with God" [Ibid. xv.]. Of a similar character is the language of Tertullian, who says that by Baptism man is restored to the Image of God which he had lost, "recovering again that Spirit of God which had by God been breathed into him, but which he had afterwards lost through sin" [Tertull. De Bapt. v.]. But the most elaborate of all the early writers on the subject is Irenæus, who, having in one chapter of his work against heresies shewn that our Lord is the Spirit of God, follows up his theme through eight later chapters [Iren. Adv. Hæres. v. 8-15]. The general substance of what he says is represented by the following quotation: "The first Adam was made by the Lord a living soul, the second Adam a quickening Spirit. As, then, he who was made a living soul forfeited life when he turned aside to what was evil, so, on the other hand, the same man when he returns to what is good and receives the Quickening Spirit shall find Life" [Ibid. v. 12]. "Spiritual men shall not be incorporeal spirits," he had said before, "but our substance, that is the union of flesh and soul, receiving the Spirit of God, becomes the spiritual man" [Ibid. v. 8], and "there are three elements out of which, as I have shewn, the perfect man is made up, the flesh, the soul, and the spirit" [Ibid. v. 9].

The early Patristic theology thus indicated (and many more such passages might be quoted) leads to the conclusion that the Christian, being regenerated by the sanctifying power of God the Holy Spirit in Baptism, receives from Him a new element, the spiritual element, of human nature; and that this spiritual element is, in a degree, the spiritual substance of the "life-giving Spirit," God Incarnate.[1] Hence the baptismal gift is called ὁ ἀῤῥαβων, the "earnest" or "foretaste" of the Spirit [2 Cor. i. 22, v. 5], as being the initiation of that indwelling of the "Quickening Spirit" which is developed and perfected by the repeated communication of His Presence in the Elements of the Holy Eucharist. And the full work of the indwelling of God Incarnate is shewn by St. Paul in the sequel to his declaration, "The Spirit giveth life, . . . now the Lord is that Spirit" [2 Cor. iii. 6, 17]. For he adds, "But we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same Image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord" [Ibid. 18].

The recognition of this truth throws much light upon the nature of grace. God the Holy Ghost overshadowed the Blessed Virgin Mary, and God the Son becoming incarnate within her she was at once entitled by His Presence to be addressed by the angel as κεχαριτωμένη, gratia plena, full of grace. So God the Holy Ghost overshadows the Sacraments and those who receive them, and they become the means of conveying to the receivers the Presence of Him Whose indwelling replenishes with grace, and Who (as the "Quickening Spirit") is the true grace of God by which man becomes sanctified. Hence the great statement of the Incarnation given by St. John speaks of the Incarnate Word objectively as "full of grace and truth," and then adds as the subjective result, "And of His fulness have all we received, and grace for grace" [John i. 14, 16]. Hence also the prayer of St. Paul for the Ephesians, "that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God" [Eph. iii. 19]; and his declaration of the object of the Incarnation, that we may "all come . . . unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" [Eph. iv. 13].

[1] It is singular to find this great truth indicated by Plato and Seneca. The first says that man could never do what he does, morally, "unless a certain Divine Spirit were dwelling in his soul" [εἰ μή τι θεῖον ὄντως ἐνῆν πνεῦμα τῇ ψυχῇ, Opp. III. iii. 514], while the latter writes, "God is near thee, with thee, in thee. Yea, a holy spirit dwells within us" [Ep. xli. ad init.]. "Seeds of divinity have been sown in the bodies of men, which come up like to their original, if they meet with good husbandry" [Ep. lxxiii. ad fin.].

Much light is also thrown upon the mystery of union with Christ and of the Life of God in the soul. For the "Spirit in the inner man," Christ dwelling in the heart by faith [Eph. iii. 16, 17], constitutes a very different bond of unity between the Head and His members from that which would be accomplished by a federal agreement, or verbal covenant. Personal union explains such sayings as "I am the Vine, ye are the branches;" "Abide in Me, and I in you;" "Now ye are the Body of Christ, and members in particular;" "We are members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones;" "partakers of the Divine Nature." Such sayings can only be explained away by the identification of union with Christ with a covenant between Him and men, but they are clearly explained by the doctrine indicated in the preceding pages. For it is thus shewn that union with Christ is an incorporation of the nature of the Christian with the nature of Christ; that the growth and development of the Christian's spirit are "according to the measure of the gift of Christ," Who, by the work of God the Holy Ghost, gives Himself to that end; that Christ being "formed in" the Christian [Gal. iv. 19], he goes on "from the glory" of Creation "to the glory" of New Creation; that his "life is hid with Christ in God;" and that thus he can live in the Spirit, because the Spirit lives in him. [INCARNATION. MEDIATION. SOUL. SPIRIT, HOLY. Delitzsch's System of Biblical Psychology (Clarke's transl.). Heard's Tripartite Nature of Man. Bishop Bull's State of Man before the Fall. Dodwell's Natural Mortality of the Soul.]

SPIRIT, THE HOLY. The Third Person in the Blessed Trinity, of one Substance, Majesty, and Glory with the Father and the Son, Very and Eternal God. He was in some measure revealed to mankind under the Old Testament dispensation, the first page of the Pentateuch declaring that "the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters" at the time of the creation. But, as with the Second Person of the Godhead so with the Third Person, it was reserved for the New Testament dispensation to reveal Him perfectly in His individual Personality, and His Divine Nature; He Himself bringing into the world the Light by whose illumination He was to be discerned. It was also reserved for the New Testament dispensation to fully develope the work of the Holy Ghost in the economy of grace, that work being dependent on, and associated with, the saving work of the Incarnation.

I. THE PERSONALITY OF THE HOLY SPIRIT. At a very early age of the Christian Church there arose an opinion that Τὸ Πνεῦμα Ἅγιον was nothing more than a scriptural name for an energy or operation of the One God; and this opinion has necessarily been engrafted into every form of Unitarianism, from that of Sabellius in the third century to that of Socinus in the sixteenth. There is, however, abundant proof in Holy Scripture itself that the Holy Spirit is a Person, and such has always been the doctrine expressed in the creeds of the Church, in the doxologies of Divine Service, and in the formula with which Holy Baptism is administered.

Even in the Old Testament there are passages which indicate the existence of the Holy Spirit as an individual Person. Thus the expression "the Spirit of Elohim" which "moved upon the face of the waters" [Gen. i. 2] cannot be taken as identical with that of "Elohim" alone in the preceding verse; nor can it be taken as meaning merely an operation of "Elohim;" nor as signifying a force that received its impulse from "Elohim." On the contrary, it appears as an intelligent "Spirit," by its own power, and with a volition of its own; that is, acting in such a way as can only be predicated of a person, of that which has a living individuality.

Thus, again, the evidence for the doctrine of the Trinity which is afforded by the mysterious visit of the three "angels" to Abraham [Gen. xviii. 2, 13] is also evidence for the Personality of each of those whom the "angels" represented; the threefold benediction given for the use of the Jewish priesthood [Numb. vi. 24], and the threefold ascription of angelic praise revealed to Isaiah [Isa. vi. 3], are a similar evidence; the emphatic expression of the same prophet, "The Lord God and His Spirit hath sent me" [Isa. xlviii. 16], indicates the same idea of a personality of the Spirit, especially when so closely connected with that of "the Redeemer" in the following words; and, lastly, even where the Spirit is spoken of as "My Spirit," "Thy Spirit," or "His Spirit" [Gen. vi. 3; Psa. li. 11; Job xxvi. 13], there is still an idea of separateness and individuality which forbids us to identify the Spirit spoken of with the Person Whose Spirit it is said to be, and therefore leads us to think of that Spirit as a distinct Person.

The opening page of the New Testament, however, reveals distinctly the individual Personality of the Holy Spirit. For in predicting the mystery of the Incarnation the angel Gabriel speaks of Him without any qualifying pronoun, with a distinctive article, and with the prefix "holy," saying to the Blessed Virgin Mary "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee" [Luke i. 35]; the force of such a manner of expression being intensified by that of the following words, "and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee," in which the idea of personality is wanting. A similar distinctive title is also given by St. Matthew, who says that "she was found with child of the Holy Ghost" [Matt. i. 18]. In after days our Lord Himself spoke of the Holy Spirit as a Person Who was to teach, to guide, to reprove and convince the world; to testify of Him, to be a Comforter to His disciples, to abide with them for ever [John xiv. 16, 17, 26; xv. 26; xvi. 8, 13]: and above all He placed the Name of the same Holy Spirit in exact apposition with the Names of the personal Father and the personal Son when He commissioned His Apostles to go forth baptizing "in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost" [Matt. xxviii. 19]. Stronger testimony than this there could not be, and it is only by way of corroboration that the witness of the Apostolic writings may be added when they exhibit the Holy Spirit as a Person bestowing spiritual gifts according to His will [1 Cor. xii. 8, 11], giving verbal directions [Acts x. 28, xiii. 2; Rev. ii. 7, xxii. 17], as helping our infirmities, and interceding for us [Rom. viii. 26], as renewing [Tit. iii. 5], and sanctifying [Rom. xv. 16] God's people.

Thus the personality of the Holy Ghost is revealed distinctly in association with the work of Creation and New Creation; He is shewn as a Person Who acted in some mysterious manner upon the waters of the primeval chaos, Who wrought the Incarnation of God the Son in the womb of the Blessed Virgin, Who has a Name that may be set by the side of the Name of the Father and the Name of the Son, and Who exercises a personal action upon mankind in the work of redemption.

II. The Divinity of the Holy Ghost. In modern times very few persons would be found who would acknowledge that the Holy Spirit is a Person and yet deny that He is a Divine Person, the Sabellian idea being that which is commonly entertained by philosophical Pneumatomachi, as well as that which pervades the indefinite belief of the multitude. But in the early ages of Christianity there was a persistent current of heresy respecting the Holy Ghost which ran parallel with the heresy that eventually developed into Arianism. Thus Simon Magus, Montanus, and Manes, each appear to have represented themselves as the promised Paraclete, making Him out to be a human person; and it is certain that their respective followers entertained such a notion of each of their founders. The Valentinians asserted that the Holy Ghost was an angel; and the Macedonians formulated the belief of the Arians, that He was a created Being analogous to their imaginary created Son of God. Against this persistent heresy in all its forms the Constantinopolitan creed asserted the traditional faith of the Church: "And [we believe] in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and the Life-giver, Who proceedeth from the Father, Who with the Father and the Son is worshipped and glorified, Who spake by the prophets;" the co-equal and co-eternal glory and majesty of the Third with the First and Second Persons of the Blessed Trinity being more fully still declared in a formula almost as ancient as that creed, viz. the Athanasian Hymn.

The evidence which proves the Personality of the Holy Ghost does, in reality, go far to prove also His Divine Nature, especially that which is drawn from the words of our Lord; and, of those words, especially from the formula which He ordained to be used in the administration of Baptism. But much more evidence is to be found in the New Testament, for the Holy Spirit is frequently spoken of in terms which could only be used of God, and characteristics are attributed to Him which could only be attributed to God.

Thus St. Peter says to Ananias, "Why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost? . . . thou hast not lied unto man but unto God," and to Sapphira, "Ye have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord" [Acts v. 3, 4, 9]; thus declaring that the "Holy Ghost" and the "Spirit of the Lord," are the names of One Who is God. And as St. John declares that the glory of the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity was seen and spoken of by Isaiah, when he saw "the Lord sitting upon a throne . . . and heard the voice of the Lord" [Isa. vi. 1, 8; John xii. 41], so St. Paul declares that voice to have been the voice of the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity, "Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers" [Acts xxviii. 25, 26]. In the Epistle to the Hebrews, also, "the Holy Ghost" is called "the Living God" Whom the Israelites had tempted in the wilderness [Heb. iii. 7, 12]: in that to the Corinthians He is declared to be the God Who inhabits the spiritual temple of the Christian body [1 Cor. iii. 6, vi. 19]; to be the Lord Whose Presence brings liberty [2 Cor. iii. 17]; and the God from Whom proceed spiritual gifts, administrations, and operations [1 Cor. xii. 4-11]. Such are a few of the many scriptural sayings which shew that the Holy Ghost is God, one in Substance, Glory, and Majesty with the Father and the Son; sayings in which He receives the Name of God, and in which there are assigned to Him the attributes and operations of the Divine Nature. Others might be easily added which attribute to Him Omniscience [1 Cor. ii. 10], Omnipotence [Rom. viii. 11], Omnipresence [Wisd. i. 7], Creative power [Psa. civ. 30], ability to inspire [2 Pet. i. 21], and other qualities or attributes of the Godhead, but those which have been quoted are enough to indicate the line of proof, and to shew the sufficiency of the evidence. The relation of the Third to the other Persons of the Blessed Trinity is also dealt with elsewhere. [Procession of the Holy Ghost.]

III. The Office of the Holy Spirit. This may be spoken of generally as that of complementing the work of God the Father and God the Son, perfecting that which each has originated and created. Not that there is ever any incompleteness, properly speaking, in any work of God, but that in the orderliness of the Divine Counsels the Divine Will acts now through one, now through another of the Divine Persons, as it is said of the Second Person that "all things were made by Him, and without Him was not anything made that was made" [John i. 3], and that by Him God "made the worlds" [Heb. i. 2]. Thus "the Spirit of God" appears to have "moved upon the face of the waters," to bring forth light and order from darkness and chaos, and so to have complemented the creation of matter. Thus, also, all "the host" of the heavens (by which the holy angels are probably signified), are said by the Psalmist to have been made by the "Breath" of the Lord's mouth, as the "heavens" were made by His Word [Psa. xxxiii. 6]. And in the same manner the Spirit of God co-operated in the creation of man, when "the Lord God . . . breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul" [Gen. ii. 7] by the communication of that complement of his tripartite nature which distinguishes man from other animals. [SPIRIT. MEDIATION.] So, again, in the Incarnation, by which the re-creation of mankind was effected, the "Father sent the Son into the world," the Son Himself became incarnate, and the Holy Spirit overshadowed the Blessed Virgin that she might be the instrument by which human nature should be taken into the Divine, "conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary." And as the Holy Ghost thus wrought in the beginning of the re-creation, so He continues to work throughout its whole course; regenerating mankind that they may become partakers of the new nature, sanctifying them that the new nature may abide with them in the kingdom of grace, and eventually reach that abode where the Incarnate God has gone to prepare a place for those whose sanctification reaches its final stage.

SPONSORS [ἀνάδοχοι; sponsores or susceptores]. Those who "promise and vow" in the name of the baptized. They are also called god-parents (in old English "god-sibs" or "gossips," i.e. god-relations) and sureties.

There is very ancient authority for the use of sponsors at holy baptism. We find mention of them in Tertullian, De Bapt. c. xviii. [circa 200]; also in the Apostolic Constitutions, lib. iii. c. 16; in St. Cyril of Alexandria, Comm. in Joan. xi. 26; in the Decrees of the fourth Council of Carthage, c. xii. [A.D. 398], and, very frequently, in the writings of St. Augustine. They are required by the Church as security that the children or adults receiving the grace of Baptism be taught what a solemn vow and profession has been made for them. In early times, especially, when children who had been deserted by heathen parents were presented for baptism, there would arise a great necessity for god-parents in order that they might be instructed and brought up as Christians.

Three sorts of sponsors are enumerated by Bingham [Antiq. xi. 8]:—

I. Those for infants, who were required to answer the interrogatories, and to be guardians of the child's education.

II. For adults who could not answer for themselves, e.g. persons afflicted with loss of speech or reason, or in extremity of sickness. If such persons had beforehand desired baptism, it was administered, the sponsors making answer as in the case of infants.

III. For adults in general. In this case the sponsors were rather witnesses, and did not answer in the name of the baptized, though it was their duty in after life to remind them of their obligations. This is the view taken in our own office for adult baptism.

The primitive custom of the Church was to require only one sponsor at baptism. This is the existing practice both of the Greek and Latin Churches, though two sponsors are permitted. In the case of adults a man was sponsor for a man and a woman for a woman,[1] but in the case of infants this rule was not observed. The Sarum rubric only permitted two god-parents, "nisi alia fuerit consuetudo approbata" [Maskell, Mon. Rit. i. p. 31]. Three was the largest number ever permitted, and it is doubtful if so many were ever required in the English Church until A.D. 1661, when the present rubric was inserted.

In primitive times it is clear that parents were permitted to act as sponsors for their children, e.g. St. Augustine plainly says "quando ad baptismum offeruntur parentes pro eis, tanquam fidedictores, respondent" [Epist. xxiii. ad Bonifac.]. The first decree to the contrary was made by the Council of Mentz [A.D. 813]. Our own twenty-ninth canon, which made a similar prohibition (herein following the Sarum rubric), was altered by the Convocation of Canterbury in 1865, but the alteration has never been adopted by that of York, or promulgated by the Crown.

It was customary in early ages for the office of sponsor to be chiefly undertaken by deacons and deaconesses, τὸν μὲν ἄνδρα ὑποδεχέσθω ὁ διάκονος· τὴν δε γυναικα, ἡ διάκονος [Const. Apost. lib. iii. c. 16]. Catechumens, energumens, heretics, and penitents, were excluded from being sponsors. The law of the Church of England still requires the god-parents to be communicants.

By a law of Justinian [Cod. lib. v. tit. 4, de Nuptiis, leg. xxvi.] marriage is forbidden between sponsors and those whom they have brought to baptism. This law is confirmed and extended in its operation by the decree of the Council of Trullo [A.D. 692], and being further enacted (with certain limitations) by the Council of Trent, it is the law of the Church of Rome at the present day.

SUBDEACONS. [ὑποδιάκονοι; ὑπηρέται; subdiaconi.] An order appointed to assist and serve the deacons of the Church, as the deacons served the higher orders. They are of more ancient institution than any of the "minores ordines," Bona, who acknowledges them to be of ecclesiastical institution, referring that of subdeacons to the time of the Apostles: "Subdiaconorum licet expressa mentio in sacris litteris non reperiatur, eorum tamen institutio vel ad Christum, ut recentiores scholastici existimant, vel ad apostolos referenda est" [Bona, Rer. Liturg. I. xxv. n. 16]. Augusti [xi. 23] traces a connection between subdeacons and the ὑπηρέται of the New Testament, and this is a word very frequently employed to designate them in ecclesiastical writings. Martene's opinion on the question is as follows: "Ad primam classem revocandi sunt illi soli quorum meminit scriptura—episcopatus, presbyteratus, diaconatus quos a Christo institutos profitemur. Quibus tandem accessit subdiaconatus qui cum quatuor minoribus ordinibus secundo tertiove a Christo nato sæculo institutus est ab Ecclesia" [De Antiq. Eccl. Rit. lib. I. c. viii. p. 260].

There is no certain mention of subdeacons until the third century, but they are then spoken of as a settled order of the Church. St. Cyprian mentions them in many of his epistles, and Cornelius [A.D. 251-252], in his letter to Fabius, says that the Church of Rome had seven ὑποδιάκονοι [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 43], a number which in that Church would seem to have been constant. They are named along with readers and singers in the Apostolic Canons [lxix.].

[1] See the decree of Leo quoted by Gratian, De Consecrat. Distinct. iv. c. cii.; and also the canon of the Council of Metz, quoted in Bingham, Antiq. XI. viii.

It is most probable that they were not ordained by imposition of hands. St. Basil speaks of the order as ἀχειροτόνητος ὑπηρεσία [Ep. can. li.]. The fourth Council of Carthage [A.D. 398] thus gives directions as to their ordination:—"When the subdeacon is ordained, since he does not receive the imposition of hands, let him receive an empty paten and an empty chalice (patenam vacuam et calicem vacuum) from the hand of the bishop. And from the hand of the archdeacon (let him receive) an ewer, together with water, a towel, and maniple" (urceolum cum aqua, et mantile, et manutergium; c. v.). It should be stated, per contra, that the Apostolic Constitutions [viii. 21] speak of St. Thomas the Apostle as ordering subdeacons to be ordained with the imposition of hands and prayer. In the Roman Ordinal, the bishop causes the candidate to lay his hands on an empty chalice and paten, saying, "Have a care to the ministry which is entrusted to you, and present yourself unto God in such manner as is well-pleasing unto Him." Then the candidate lays his hand on the book of the Epistles and the further charge is given: "Receive this book, and authority to read the Epistles in the holy Church of God." The candidates are clothed in white, and are also vested by the bishop in amice, maniple, and tunicle.

As to the duties of subdeacons, Martene [De Antiq. Eccl. Rit., lib. i. 356] quotes "ex MS. pontificali Anglicano monasterii Gemeticensis, circa 900—'Quare vocatur subdiaconus. Ideo subdiaconi appellantur quia subjacent præceptis et officiis Levitarum, oportet illis epistolam legere, onestare altare, et aquam præparare in ministerio altaris. Unde et Dominus subdiaconus appellatus est quia in Chana Galilææ aquam in vinum convertit.'"

They had to prepare the vessels of the altar, but had no place in the sanctuary, and are forbidden by the Council of Laodicea [A.D. 366] ἅπτεσθαι δεσποτικῶν σκευῶν [c. xxi.]. Bona remarks [I. xxv. n. 16], "Olim nec calicem, nec patenam, nec oblationes in altari ponebant, sed hæc omnia porrigebant diaconis, eisque serviebant intra sanctuarium." They are also forbidden to wear the stole (ὡράριον φορεῖν), or to leave the doors [Concil. Laodic. c. xxii.]. They had to place the different classes, i.e. catechumens, penitents, &c., in their recognised places in the church, and also to guard the doors from all intruders when the holy mysteries were being celebrated. For this purpose the Apostolic Constitutions order the subdeacons to stand at the women's gate. They were very generally employed as messengers of the bishops, especially to foreign churches, and as such are named by St. Cyprian [Ep. xxiv. al. xxix.]. The number at Constantinople is given at ninety in Justinian, Novell. vi. 43.

In the Roman Church the subdeacons have charge of the holy vessels, mingle the water with the wine of the chalice, sing the epistle, and hold the book of the gospels to the deacon, &c. They are vested in alb and tunicle. One of these vestments, expressly called subdiaconalem, was bequeathed by St. Ansegisus [A.D. 820] to the Abbey of Fontenelle in Normandy.

St. Gregory the Great [A.D. 590-604] mentions that the privilege of wearing the tunicle was granted to the subdeacons so long before his day that he knew not by whom. [Epist. xii. lib. ix. Op. tom. II. p. 940.]

The "Epistoler," mentioned in the twenty-fourth canon and in the Injunctions of Queen Elizabeth (7th year), corresponds in some respects to the subdeacon of earlier times. At Hereford, by a statute of the year A.D. 1583, there were to be four subcanons, deacons, or subdeacons. These, by another statute [A.D. 1637], might be laymen, but were to live in the college of vicars. [Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. I. ii. 30. Bingham, Antiq. iii. 2.]

SUBLAPSARIANISM. The theory of moderate Calvinists, who, wishing to avoid the fearful inference to be drawn from Supralapsarianism, that God is the author of sin, maintain that God did not decree, but only foresaw the Fall of Adam: but if, as admitted, the consequences of his sin be equally ruinous according to each theory—all men being eternally lost with the exception of a few saved by the irresistible grace of election—the attempt is fruitless to remove the odium from the Creator by a mere change of term. It cannot be of essential moment whether God foresaw Adam's sin and its tremendous effects without interfering to prevent it, or according to another theory, whether the Fall is solely owing to God's predestination and decree. Its consequences as regards the human race are in each case exactly the same, which obviously is the only point of real importance. [Calvinism.]

SUBJECTIVE. [Objective.]

SUBSTANCE. Substance is Being; "something of which we can say that it is" [Johnson], whether visible or invisible; create or uncreate. It may include personal distinction. Humanity is a substantive unity, distinct from angelic substance on the one side, and from the lower forms of life on the other. But in that humanity individuals are indefinitely varied, though its substance be only one. The vast number of individuals of which it consists causes us to confuse substance and person, and we deem each personal substance to be per se substance. Adam at first represented the entire substance of humanity; in him personality was co-extensive with substance. When Eve was formed of this substance, bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh, human substance was still an unity, though there was now in it a distinction of persons; and the same principle holds good at the present day; the substance of humanity derived from one common forefather, the protoplast, is one; the individuals of which that common humanity consists are some eight or nine hundred millions of singly responsible persons.

Of the Divine Substance it can only be stated that God is the Divine attributes, and these attributes are God. "Absit ut spiritus secundum substantiam dicatur Deus, et bonus secundum qualitatem; sed utrumque secundum substantiam" [Aug. De Trin. xv. 5]. His substance is a simple multiplicity of attributes, as His attributes are the manifold unity of His substance [Ibid. vi. 4]. "Quicquid attribuitur Deo est ejus essentia; et propter hoc, sapientia et virtus idem sunt in Deo, quia ambo sunt in divina essentia" [Aquin. Summa, i. xl. 1]. But a God that can be known as He is, is no God. Hooker's words may be remembered, "Our soundest knowledge is to know that we know Him not, as indeed He is, neither can know Him; and our safest eloquence concerning Him is our silence; when we confess without confession, that His glory is inexplicable, His greatness above our capacity and reach. He is above and we upon earth, therefore it behoveth that our words be wary and few" [Eccl. Pol. i. 2. Ὀτσι'α.].

SUBSTRATI. [Genuflectentes.]

SUFFRAGAN. A bishop subject to an archbishop alone. Originally the bishops of a province elected the archbishop or confirmed his election; and also gave their vote or suffrage in a provincial council. Thus the same prelate was a suffragan in this view, a diocesan in relation to his diocese, and an ordinary in regard to jurisdiction. The grand vicar or chancellor of the diocese was also called a suffragan. Suffrage was a vote in a deliberative assembly, and in the Novels of Justinian meant money [xvi.], "qui emerit præsulatum per suffragium, episcopatu et ordine ecclesiastico excidat."

In point of fact bishops subject to a metropolitan are called suffragan because they assist him in the episcopal office, viz. in consecration of bishops, attending councils and the like. When the Franks conquered the Holy Land they nominated Latin patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem, archbishops and bishops, and they pursued the same course after the capture of Constantinople. These prelates, when compelled to retire to their own country, retained their titles, even when appointed to home sees; as the archbishop of Bourges, in commendam, called himself Patriarch of Alexandria, and Anthony Bec, actual Bishop of Durham, was Patriarch of Jerusalem. Even when there was no hope of restoration to sees, ex partibus infidelium, the papal nuncios and vicars apostolic were often titulars of this description without holding any see, alike coadjutors and suffragans. The latter in Germany represented the prince and electors, bishops being their pensionaries and deputies in the discharge of episcopal functions. This abuse has been said to have taken rise in Greece.

From the thirteenth (or possibly earlier) to the sixteenth century there was in the English Church a class of bishops [1] holding nominal sees, titulars or "in partibus infidelium," in Hungary, Greece or Asia; [2] exiles, temporary or permanent, from bishopries in Ireland or Scotland during unsettled times, who were called suffragans, as they assisted the diocesan bishops in consecrations of churches, confirmations, and the ordaining of clergy, usually to the inferior orders. Henry VIII. in 1534 [26 Hen. VIII. c. 14, repealed 1 & 2 Phil. and Mary, c. viii. § 13, revived by 1 Eliz. c. i. § 9] converted these suffragans into a kind of chorepiscopi, by giving them English sees, with limited jurisdiction; their titles being taken from boroughs, not from cities. These were Dover for Canterbury, Nottingham and Hull for York, Colchester for London, Berwick for Durham, Guildford, Southampton and the Isle of Wight for Winchester, Bedford, Leicester, Grantham and Huntingdon for Lincoln, Thetford and Ipswich for Norwich, Shaftesbury, Marlborough and Molton for Salisbury, Taunton, Bridgewater for Bath and Wells, Shrewsbury for Lichfield, Cambridge for Ely, St. Germans for Exeter, and Penrith for Carlisle. Bristol was also a suffragan see in 1538. The names in italics were actually in use.

Any bishop who desires a suffragan is empowered to present two persons to the Crown, of whom the latter selects one, who is consecrated as other bishops, but whose authority is limited by commission from the diocesan. In recent times the office of Suffragan Bishop has been revived in the Church of England; one having been consecrated as Bishop of Nottingham, and another as Bishop of Dover, in the year 1870. [Stubbs, Regist. Sacr. Anglican. Burnet, Hist. of Reform., i. 319, 320. Records, p. i. b. ii. n. 51. Bingham, Orig. Eccl. b. ii. c. 14, sec. 13, 14. Brett, Ch. Gov. c. xii. Mason, b. iii. c. x. sec. 10. Nichol's Bibl. Top. vol. vi. André, Droit Canon. i. 1203.]

SUNDAY. A name for the first day of the week, adopted by the first Christians from the Roman Calendar. It is found in familiar use during the second century [Justin Mart. Apol. i. 67; Tertull. Apol. xvi., Ad Nation. i. 13]; and had, perhaps, been adopted from its easy association with the title "Sun of Righteousness," given to our Lord with reference to His "arising," or Resurrection, by the prophet Malachi [Mal. iv. 2]. There was also much confusion between the use of the name "Lord's day" as a designation of the first day of the week and of the day of Judgment [1 Cor. i. 8], which may have led to the Christianization of the title "Dies Solis."

The first day of the week was sanctified by our Lord's Resurrection, by His various appearances to the disciples, and by the descent of the Holy Ghost. It became a "beginning of days," as a commemoration of the joy and light which were the result of the Resurrection, and also of the new life which was brought into the Church of God by the Holy Ghost. Hence it was from the beginning observed as a solemn day of worship, with the celebration of the Holy Eucharist [Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2]. For some time it was observed conjointly with the Sabbath, verbal and ritual relics of such observance still remaining in our liturgical books and customs. But as Jewish habits became disused by the Gentile

Churches, this practice was generally, though slowly, discontinued. [SABBATH. Hessey's Bampton Lectures.]

SUPEREROGATION. The doctrine of works of supererogation had its foundation in that of the communion of saints. The many members of the Body being one, and having a community of sympathy in each other's joys and sorrows, and a common interest in the merits of their Divine Head, it was also believed that the merit of good works done by one Christian belonged not to him individually, but to the whole body. It appeared from Col. i. 14, that a certain amount of sufferings was to be endured by the Church, and that the sufferings of one detracted something from the measure which remained for others to give up. "Fixa est mensura passionum, quas tota exantlare debet ecclesia quo plus igitur Paulus exhausit, eo minus et ipsi posthac et ceteris relinquitur; hoc facit communio sanctorum" [Bengel, in loco]. By parity of argument it followed that as Christ has ordained His Church not only to a fellowship with Himself in sufferings, but in holiness, there is a certain amount of good works which the Church must also do before her Lord's Second Coming, and that the good works of one may be profitable to supply the deficiencies of another. It was not asserted that good works possessed merit in themselves, for they were not wrought without the grace of God, but they possessed merit because they were wrought by Christ in men and He had promised to reward them.

Because they were wrought by Christ in men it appeared more probable that the benefit extended to all the members of His Body; and that their performance was like the supplementing of His sufferings, not as a cause of pardon, but as a sacrifice which was acceptable to God. Distinction was made between the pœna and the culpa of sin. Culpa was the guilt which entailed everlasting punishment, and pœna the temporal consequence which, as in David's case, remained when the culpa was remitted. It was quoad pœnam, and not quoad culpam, that the good works of others were believed to be profitable [Cajetan, Opuscula, tom. iii. p. 169]. Its first practical application, mentioned by Tertullian, was the restoration to communion of those who had lapsed in time of persecution, at the intercession of confessors and martyrs, the good deeds of the latter being substituted for the penance which would otherwise have been exacted of the lapsed. From this grew up the belief that the good works of saints would be effectual to diminish the temporal consequences of sin in others, and hence arose the system of INDULGENCES.

A distinction appeared to exist between the precepts of Christ, which were of universal obligation, and the counsels of perfection, which were enjoined on those who could receive them. All moral and religious duties which were equally needful for all belonged to the first class, whilst martyrdom, virginity, and voluntary poverty belonged to the second. And these being voluntary works "over and above God's commandments" were called works of supererogation, which were supposed to form a treasury at the disposal of the Church for the benefit of her members. In the "Institution of a Christian Man," set forth by authority of Convocation A.D. 1537, whilst the practice of indulgences was condemned, the principle of works of supererogation was affirmed: "I believe that whatsoever spiritual gift or treasure is given by God unto any one part or member of this mystical Body of Christ, although the same be given particularly unto this member, and not unto another, yet the fruit and merit thereof shall, by reason of that incomprehensible union and bond of charity which is between them, redound necessarily unto the profit, edifying and increase in Christ's Body of all the other members particularly." The Council of Trent made no decree on the doctrine of supererogation, but in the Tridentine Catechism, part i. cap. x. quæstio 23, language is used very similar to that of the "Institution of a Christian Man" just quoted: "Sed alia etiam communio ecclesia cogitanda est. Quæcunque enim pie sancteque ab uno suscipiuntur, ea ad omnes pertinent, et, ut illis prosint, caritate, quæ non quærit quæ sua sunt, efficitur." The great abuses which had arisen from the condonation of crimes by means of indulgences purchased by wicked men were provided against by the declaration that this participation in good works is of no profit to the wicked, but only to the living members of Christ's Body.

At the time of the Reformation, the fearful profanation of indulgences had brought discredit on the doctrine of "supererogation," or, as it might be more properly called "the communion of saints in good works," and the popular teaching of the day, by exhibiting one side of the truth only, had led men to look on good works as a cause of boasting and pride. When, therefore, the Articles of Religion were framed in A.D. 1553, the fourteenth declared "That voluntary works besides, over and above God's commandments, which they call works of supererogation, cannot be taught without arrogance and impiety. For by them men do declare that they do not only render unto God as much as they are bound to do, but that they do more for His sake than of bounden duty is required; whereas, Christ saith plainly, When ye have done all that ye are commanded to do, say, We are unprofitable servants." It is clear from the wording of the article that it is not the doctrine as stated in the "Institution of a Christian Man," or in the Tridentine Catechism (which was not compiled until some years afterwards), but the opinion on the subject then prevalent, that is condemned. To believe that good works done by the grace of God promote the peace and happiness of the whole Church, is not inconsistent with meekness and humility, nor is it forbidden by the article. The man who, in obedience to the call of grace, works out the counsels of perfection, does no more than he is commanded. The disciples, in forsaking all to follow Christ, merely obeyed His call. The rich young man was bidden to observe a counsel of perfection when he was told to sell his riches and give them to the poor, but he failed in his obedience when he hesitated to do it. There are narrower ways within the narrow path, and many mansions in our Father's house, but to whichever of these the grace of God may call, that man will risk his salvation who refuses to obey. All men are not called to be martyrs, but when a man is placed in a situation which leaves him no alternative between martyrdom and apostasy, his acceptance of martyrdom can no longer be called a voluntary work over and above what is commanded. Similarly, marriage would be sin in one who was persuaded that a life of virginity would serve better to godliness [Art. XXXII.]. The saint can claim no merit apart from Christ, for it would be arrogance and impiety to believe that his works were done by his own natural strength. And, as humility is an inseparable ingredient in saintliness, after he had done all, he would still be ready to acknowledge himself an unprofitable servant, lamenting that at last he had done so little, and ascribing to his Lord the glory of all that he had done.

Although the doctrine stated has been held by divines, it has never been authoritatively decreed either by the Churches of England or Rome as an article of faith. As held in the Church of Rome, it is stated by Cardinal Bellarmine in the second book of his treatise De Monachis, in which he assumes the distinction between positive commands and counsels of perfection: "a principle," says Bishop Harold Browne, "which, rightly understood, need not be controverted." If the Cardinal had admitted that when a man is called to a counsel of perfection he is not at liberty to reject it, there would remain no ground for controversy between the Churches of England and Rome on this subject. [Keble's Academical Sermons, serm. xi. Bishop Forbes on XXXIX. Arts. Bishop Beveridge on XXXIX. Arts. Bishop Harold Browne on XXXIX. Arts.].

SUPERNATURAL. This is a word which is popularly used in opposition to "natural," things and events which are not within the ordinary concrete experience and knowledge of mankind being looked upon as forming part of a separate system of things and events. A truer and more exact use of the word is, as expressing the higher region of one continuous system of which the lower region is that of the things and events which come within ordinary experience and knowledge. In this latter sense supernatural things and events are not in any way opposed to order and law, but form the higher portion of an universal order, and are the subjects of an unknown, but not unknowable, law.

There is abundant evidence to shew that the sphere of created things and of knowable phenomena and laws is far larger than that of the known. The world of nature is a vast region into which the further we penetrate the more we see lying beyond. The most extreme boundary of what at any time may be our known region, is confidently felt to be still only the verge of a great knowable sphere of what is as yet the unknown. Experience also shews that while the region of knowledge into which one generation has passed was a region of mystery to its predecessors, yet a region of mystery still exists, and is likely to exist so long as man is what he is; and that thus, while the sphere of known order and law is continually enlarging, it is still always surrounded by a sphere of unknown order and unknown law, zone girding zone, and sphere enclosing sphere, apparently without limit. But every increase of knowledge reveals to us further illustrations of the assertion that "order is Heaven's first law." If newly discovered facts and laws seem for a time to form no part of the general system of order, we know that they are only as mountain peaks standing high up above a mist which hides their connected roots, and that when the mist is dissipated by advancing day they will all appear as part of a continuous chain.

Such experience as to the illimitable fields of phenomena in the sphere which we call Nature, and of their yet unvarying continuity, may lead us to the firmest conviction that this continuity extends to every part of creation, and to every operation of which any part of it is capable. That of which the laws were once unknown was then classed as supernatural; when our research has enabled us to form a conception of its place in God's κόσμος we class it with the natural. Unintelligent wonder is succeeded by intelligent admiration, the unknown becomes part of the known, and our conviction is strengthened that there is an orderly place for every phenomenon, however remarkable, and a law to which it is subject, however apparently exceptional and erratic in its operations.

Belief in the supernatural does not therefore require us to believe in any violation of law; since all reasoning which starts from what we know leads to the conclusion that "supernatural" phenomena are as much the result of law as phenomena which are called "natural." What we see of God's κόσμος establishes a reasonable conviction that order exists even in what we do not see: and to class any phenomena in such a way as to imply that they break this order is unreasonable. Beyond the farthest point to which our existing intelligence can ever reach there will be ever a region which it cannot reach: but the knowable and the as yet unknowable are evidently parts of one continuous and consistent whole, and are subject to a system of law of which unity and continuity are equally predicable.

Thus "miracles," the wonders of the unintelligent mind, reveal to the mind which is convinced of Divine orderliness either the results of unknown law, or new results of known law. Sometimes a known force is resisted, sometimes it is accelerated. As any one can interrupt a known and unvarying force like gravitation by arresting the fall of a descending body, or accelerate the operation of that force by increasing the momentum of the descending body; so the Supreme Controller of all force could interrupt the "natural" course of dissolution in the body of Lazarus, and accelerate the process of resurrection. But in neither case is there any violation of law, for the law of resistance by which a falling body is arrested in its fall is as much a law as that of gravitation in obedience to which it falls; and the law by which the process of dissolution is arrested, or that of resurrection accelerated, is equally part of a system of law, and of the orderliness in which all things are arranged by God. The veil of "supernatural" phenomena and "supernatural" law is for a moment lifted by a miracle, and forthwith it becomes evident that "Nature" is not to be limited by the boundaries of our experience, but that it extends into a region which is ordinarily unseen, and forms one great system of order of which the "supernatural" is but the higher atmosphere. [MIRACLES. NATURE. NATURE, LAWS OF.]

SUPERSTITION. The ancient sense of the word "superstitio" was that of worship over and above that which was appointed by proper authority. Hence religious systems not recognised by the Roman State were called "superstitions," Christianity itself being for some centuries among the number. The usage of the word in recent times has been very arbitrary, little regard being had to anything more than its convenience as a term of condemnation. It does not seem always to have been used in a bad sense, however, in Old English, as is shewn by Acts xvii. 22, where it represents δεισιδαιμονία, a word used by the Apostle as indicating that the Athenians were a God-fearing people who would not refuse to listen to his appeal about the "unknown God."

Yet, as a rule, superstition is to be regarded as a parody of faith, the latter being a belief founded on credible authority or other sufficient evidence, while superstition is a belief on insufficient evidence, or on no evidence at all. While faith may, therefore, be called an evidential belief in things unseen (the highest evidence of all being Divine revelation of them), superstition may be called a speculative belief; and its tendency is towards credulity.

A large element of superstition must necessarily enter into the religion of all very devout but ignorant persons, and the uprooting of it without a corresponding instruction in matters of faith may go far to destroy devotional habits and to induce an ignorant scepticism. It is well, therefore, to remember this in dealing with superstitions that take a Christian form among religious Christians of the illiterate classes; and some wise words written many years ago may be recalled to mind. "Let us not be superstitiously afraid," said Alexander Knox, "of superstition. It shews great ignorance of the human heart, and the springs by which its passions are moved, to neglect taking advantage of the impression which particular circumstances, times, and seasons, naturally make upon the mind. The root of all superstition is the principle of the association of ideas; by which objects, naturally indifferent, become dear and venerable through their connection with interesting ones. It is true, this principle has been much abused; it has given rise to pilgrimages innumerable, worship of relics, and priestly power. But let us not carry our ideas of purity and simplicity so far, as to neglect it entirely" [Knox's Remains, ii. 448].

It may be added that some forms of intellectual scepticism involve superstition of a far more dangerous kind than that involved in the credulity of ignorant piety; and that such scepticism is often found going hand in hand with a credulity that is always ready to receive the "phenomena" of such absurdities as table-turning, spirit-rapping, &c. &c., while it scornfully rejects many well-proved articles of Christian belief.

SUPRALAPSARIANISM. A term used to denote the theory of Calvin, Beza, and others, who, supposing that nothing could happen independently of the Divine Will and purpose, maintained that God had decreed the Fall of Adam, which is the source and origin of all evil—a theory which seems necessarily to imply that God is the author of sin. [CALVINISM.]

SUPREMACY, PAPAL. An authority, partly spiritual and partly temporal, which the Bishop of Rome claims to exercise over the clergy (and, through them, over the laity) of the whole world. It is claimed on the ground that the Bishops of Rome are, in the fullest sense, successors of St. Peter, that they therefore inherit all the authority which was given by our Lord to that holy Apostle, and that the authority so given constituted St. Peter the supreme deputy of Christ. Hence the Popes claim to be, as representatives of St. Peter, the supreme spiritual sovereigns of the world.

There is no trace of any such claim as this being advanced by the Bishops of Rome, nor of any such authority being exercised by them until several hundred years after the death of St. Peter. At the Council of Nicæa [A.D. 325] a patriarchal authority over the churches of the "province" or "exarchate" of Rome is declared to be customary [σύνηθες], and a similar privilege is therefore declared to belong also, as an "ancient custom," to the Bishops of Alexandria and Antioch. But there is no indication whatever in the convocation of that council, in its decrees, or in any writings contemporary with it, that up to that time the Bishops of Rome had exercised any authority beyond that of other metropolitans. Until then, the Church of Rome had only an honorary precedence allowed to it; and although, on account of the greatness of the see, the fraternal intercourse which existed between the churches of different countries had often taken the form of applications to Rome for information and advice, and of letters from Rome of warning and of censure, yet in this there was no concession of authority to Rome; and the very writers who used words of largest import regarding her precedency—such as Irenæus, Tertullian, and Cyprian—shewed in their writings, as well as in their actions, that submission to her was by no means recognised as a duty. On the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the Empire, however, the Bishop of Rome rose at once to the rank of a great accredited functionary. He was the first Christian in the first city of the world, and that city was legally Christian. Within a very short time after this official recognition of Christianity as the religion of the Roman Empire, we find its metropolitan bishop assuming a much more important position than had ever before been assigned to him; and from that time his claims to supremacy began to be developed.

The course of its development was marked by the change of the fraternal admonitions and applications for advice, into a system of formal appeals to an acknowledged jurisdiction; the lineal descent from St. Peter, and the primacy of St. Peter being gradually put forward to supply the authority for that jurisdiction. Disputes in other churches were referred to the see which was first in rank, and its bishops gradually increased their power, sometimes by an honest defence of the right, sometimes by a dexterous management of the cases presented to them. When an officer of high standing is frequently chosen to be an arbitrator, he easily passes into a judge.

1. At the Council of Sardica [A.D. 347] a definite appellate jurisdiction was given to the Bishop of Rome. In the third Canon it is ordered that if any bishop was dissatisfied with the judgment given in any case on which he was tried within his own province, he might honour the memory of the Apostle Peter by writing to the Bishop of Rome, who, if he thought good, might order a fresh trial, and name the judges before whom it was to take place.

This canon (though of no authority, since it was made after the Eastern Bishops had left the council, and was never ratified) shews plainly that the Western Bishops were at that time ready to submit to the supremacy of Rome. The power of the emperors was exerted on the same side. Valentinian I. decreed that every bishop should possess the right of appeal to Rome, and that every metropolitan should be bound to appear when cited [Baronius, ad An. 381, n. 2]. Valentinian III. decreed that all bishops were bound to appear before the Bishop of Rome upon citation [Ibid. ad An. 445, n. 9], this latter decree establishing indeed almost an absolute judicial supremacy in the Holy See.

This system of appeals encroached, it will be at once perceived, upon the powers of metropolitans and their provincial synods. Much resistance was made by the metropolitans, who were not disposed to surrender their prerogatives, so that the papal authority remained for some time indefinite; nor was the appellate jurisdiction of Rome fairly established until the pontificate of Gregory, A.D. 590-604.

2. An appellate jurisdiction might have existed without other interference in the affairs of the churches. But the Romish notion of supremacy was different: and that notion was strengthened by the peculiarity of the Romish patriarchate proper, or vicariate of Rome, in none of whose ten provinces was there a metropolitan. As the office of metropolitan could not be abolished the aim of the popes was to make the holders of the office delegates of Rome. It was in this way that their encroachments began in Illyricum, Siricius appointing the metropolitan of Thessalonica his delegate to rule the province. Leo followed this precedent, not resting, however, his title to supremacy on his patriarchal power, or on the claim of the Western Empire to the allegiance of Illyricum, but grounding it on the universal dominion which belongs to the successors of St. Peter. Upon the same ground Siricius had affirmed that Rome was the head of the Church in Spain. Early in the fifth century Zosimus interfered in Gaul, and here we meet that limitation in the power of the metropolitan which was so constantly insisted on afterwards. Zosimus recognised the Bishop of Arles as metropolitan, but reserved to his own hearing the greater causes. His epistle begins authoritatively, "Placuit sedi Apostolicæ." And under Hilary Romish supremacy was established in Gaul, the Gallican bishops in their private contests seeking the support of Rome.

The subjugation of metropolitans was significantly marked by placing on their shoulders the yoke of the pallium. Hallam says, "Pelagius II. had, about A.D. 580, sent a pallium to the Bishop of Arles, perpetual vicar of the Roman See in Gaul. Gregory I. had made a similar present to other metropolitans. But it was never supposed that they were obliged to wait for this favour before they received consecration until a synod of the French and German bishops held at Frankfort in A.D. 742, by Boniface, a legate of Pope Zachary. It was here enacted that, as a token of their willing submission to the See of Rome, all metropolitans should request the pallium at the hands of the Pope, and obey his lawful commands. This was construed by the popes to mean a promise of obedience before receiving the pall, which was changed in after times by Gregory VII. into an oath of fealty." Gregory thus completed the destruction of the liberties of provincial churches, so that the Pope was to be not merely the supreme, but the sole ruler of the ecclesiastical body, the one bishop of the whole Church, all other bishops being only his deputies or vicars. [JURISDICTION.]

This perpetual control was maintained by legates. The metropolitans, as we have seen, were generally accredited as the Pope's vicars; yet as they could not but entertain some regard for the liberties of their own churches, and sometimes desire to regain their own rights, legates a latere were sent, suspending the office of the ordinary vicars, with an unbounded power over the churches where they resided. To such an extent did papal despotism proceed, that by a constitution of Alexander II., whose adviser was Hildebrand, no bishop in the Catholic Church was permitted to exercise his functions until he had received the confirmation of the Holy See.

The Papal supremacy was riveted upon England for several centuries by the selfish acts of the Norman dynasty, whose interests were much furthered by it. But during the times of the Planteganet dynasty there was a steady current of resistance to it, which was only hindered from coming to a climax by the troubles and weakness consequent on long civil wars. "If any one will look down along the line of early English history, he will see a standing contest between the rulers of this land and the bishops of Rome. The Crown and Church of England, with a steady opposition, resisted the entrances and encroachment of the secularized ecclesiastical power of the Pope in England. The last rejection of it was no more than a successful effort after many a failure in struggles of the like kind" [Manning on the Unity of the Church, p. 361, ed. 1845].

The course by which this continuous resistance finally culminated in the entire repudiation of the Papal jurisdiction is thus summed up by a recent historian of the Reformation :—

"1. In 1531 the clergy in Convocation petitioned the King for an Act of Parliament by which the payment of annates should be abolished; suggesting that if the Pope resisted the operation of such an act, England should withdraw from obedience to Rome. This declaration was nearly contemporaneous with the recognition of the royal supremacy by Convocation.

"2. A provisional act was passed in consequence, embodying the wishes and the suggestions of the clergy. This Act [23 Hen. VIII. cap. 20] did not come into operation for nearly three years, the King meanwhile endeavouring, but in vain, to bring about an amicable arrangement on the subject with the Pope.

"3. In 1532-3, an act was passed abolishing the appellate jurisdiction of the See of Rome, and vesting it in the archbishops, bishops, and other ordinaries of the Church of England. But by the 'Act of Submission,' which shortly followed, a final appeal was permitted to the King in Chancery.

"4. In 1534, the influence of the Pope in the appointments to English sees, and the profit which he derived from it, received its final deathblow from an act [25 Hen. VIII. cap. 20] which forbad the payment of first-fruits to him, and defined the manner in which bishops were in future to be appointed, by a pro formâ election of the person nominated by the King in letters missive accompanying the conge d'élire.

"5. In the same year an act was passed [25 Hen. VIII. 21] confirmed by another in 1536, by which, although all that had been done by the Pope in previous times was allowed to stand for the sake of the vested interests involved, no further authoritative documents from him were to run in England.

"6. Finally, the Convocations of Canterbury and York, the Universities, and all the clergy of England, endorsed—as they had suggested—the Acts of the State, by declaring that 'the Bishop of Rome has no greater jurisdiction conferred on him by God in this kingdom of England than any other foreign bishop.'

"Thus the jurisdiction of the Pope was finally abolished in this country, being transferred in spiritual things to the local episcopate, in temporal things to the Crown. What is called 'Roman Catholic Emancipation' has led to a restoration of it, by sufferance of Parliament, over that part of the nation which belongs to the Roman Catholic sect; but the Church of England has rejected it once and for ever" [Blunt's Reform. of Ch. of Eng. i. 277].

SUPREMACY, ROYAL. A constitutional prerogative belonging to the Crown of England, by right of which the Sovereign exercises a corrective jurisdiction over all members of the Church of England.

This ancient—and, indeed, inherent—right of the Crown was much encroached upon by the popes and their delegates during those ages in which the Roman pontiffs were able to carry into practice the Hildebrandine theories of their jurisdiction, but the constitutional struggles of the Reformation epoch brought about its entire restoration, and it is now established on a statutory foundation by 1 Eliz. cap. 1, sec. 17, which enacts: "That such jurisdictions, privileges, superiorities, and pre-eminences, spiritual and ecclesiastical, as by any spiritual or ecclesiastical power or authority hath heretofore been, or may lawfully be, exercised or used for the visitation of the ecclesiastical state and persons, and for reformation, order, and correction of the same, and of all manner of errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities, shall for ever, by authority of this present Parliament, be united and annexed to the imperial crown of this realm."

In the "Act of Supremacy" passed during the reign of Henry VIII. the sovereign is styled "the only supreme head in earth of the Church of England, called Anglicana Ecclesia," but this Act [26 Hen. VIII. cap. 1] was repealed by 1 & 2 Phil. and Mar. cap. 8, sec. 4, and the repeal was confirmed by 1 Eliz. cap. 1, sec. 4, the title being in use only from the year 1534 to 1553, and having been entirely dropped since the latter date. The style permanently expressing the Royal Supremacy is that of "supreme governor over all persons and in all causes, ecclesiastical as well as temporal within his [or "her"] dominions."

At the time of the Reformation the two points in which the Royal Supremacy was specially asserted and maintained were these :—First, that no English subject has the right of appeal from the Crown of England to the Pope of Rome; and Secondly, that no laws can be passed by the clergy in their Convocations without the consent of the Crown. These two points were statutorily established by the "Act of Appeals" [25 Hen. VIII. cap. 21], and by the "Act of Submission" [25 Hen. VIII. cap. 19], which, since their revival in the first year of Queen Elizabeth, have never been called in question.[1]

In recent times the point of chief interest associated with the Royal Supremacy is its exercise in the final decision of ecclesiastical causes.

[1] The consideration and construction of canons ecclesiastical lies within the ordinary power of Convocation, sitting for that purpose by the sovereign's license : but legal status is given to them by assent of the Crown in letters patent "publishing and promulgating" them. The action of the Crown in the matter is very clearly shewn by the letters patent which form the prefix and supplement to the Canons of A.D. 1603.

This is a development of the prerogative which arose out of the system of papal appeals foisted on the Church of England during the Middle Ages. The ancient course of appeals from a lower to a higher judge in ecclesiastical causes is set forth by the eighth of the Constitutions of Clarendon [A.D. 1164], which is as follows:—"Ab Archidiacono debit procedi ad Episcopum, ab Episcopo ad Archiepiscopum, et si Archiepiscopus defuerit in justitiâ exhibendâ, ad Dominum Regem perveniendum est postremo, cujus mandato controversia in Curia Archiepiscopi terminetur; ita quod non debeat ultra procedi, absque assensu Domini Regis" [Wilkins' Concil. i. 435]. The Archbishops' Courts were thus the final court of appeal in each province, the Crown interfering with them only in the form of a "mandamus," if the archbishop refused to hear the cause. An opening was, however, left by the last words of this constitution for appeals to the Court of Rome, if permission was given by the Crown: and though such permission was often refused, there is no doubt that appeals were often made down to the sixteenth century; and until they were entirely forbidden by the acts for restraint of appeals, the first of which [24 Hen. VIII. cap. 12] was passed in the year 1533. Thereupon, for a time, the Archbishops' Courts remained the final courts of appeal, except in cases touching the King, when the Upper House of Convocation in each province was substituted; but in the following year [A.D. 1534], the "Act of Submission" established an appeal to the King in Chancery, causes so carried up to him being heard by a special commission delegated by the Crown for the purpose, and hence called the "Court of Delegates." This court of delegates continued to be the highest court for ecclesiastical causes for three centuries, but in the year 1832 it was abolished, and its jurisdiction transferred to the Sovereign in Council by 2 & 3 Will. IV. cap. 92. By a subsequent Act [3 & 4 Will. IV. cap. 41], a "Judicial Committee of the Privy Council" was substituted for the Sovereign in Council, and this still remains the highest court for the decision of ecclesiastical causes.

To the above view of the supremacy of the Crown, it may be added that much confusion of ideas respecting it has arisen from failing to distinguish between the working of the Royal prerogative and the working of Parliament. The Sovereign's position, as supreme governor over all persons and in all causes in the Church of England, is well defined, and strictly limited by statute. Another supremacy has, however, sprung up in England, that of Parliament, which claims to exercise authority over everything civil and everything ecclesiastical, and which frequently overrides old constitutional principles in Church and State, substituting others of a novel, and perhaps opposite, character. The constitutional form of the Royal Supremacy never comes into serious conflict with any vital principles of Church authority, but there is much danger of such a conflict in the arrogant form which is sometimes assumed by the supremacy of Parliament. [JURISDICTION. Joyce's Civil Power in its relation to the Church. Blunt's History of the Reformation, i. c. 4. Pusey on the Royal Supremacy. Gladstone on the Royal Supremacy.]

SURSUM CORDA. This liturgical relic of the Primitive Church appears in the Greek Liturgies in the form Ἄνω σχῶμεν τὰς καρδίας, Ἔχομεν πρὸς τὸν Κύριον, the Latin versicle and its response being "Sursum Corda, Habemus ad Dominum."

The "Sursum Corda" is referred to by St. Cyprian, in his treatise on the Lord's Prayer [A.D. 252], where he says, "It is for this cause that the priest before worship uses words of introduction, and puts the minds of the brethren in preparation, by saying, 'Lift up your hearts;' that while the people answer, 'We lift them up unto the Lord,' they may be reminded that there is nothing for them to think of except the Lord." [Cyp. de Orat. 20.] St. Cyril of Jerusalem, a century later, also comments upon them in these terms: "After this the priest cries aloud, 'Lift up your hearts.' For truly ought we in that most awful hour to have our heart on high with God, and not below, thinking of earth and earthly things. The priest then, in effect, bids all in that hour abandon all worldly thoughts, or household cares, and to have their heart in heaven with the merciful God. Then ye answer, 'We lift them up unto the Lord;' assenting to him by your avowal. . . . Then the priest says, 'Let us give thanks to the Lord.' For in good sooth are we bound to give thanks, that He has called us, unworthy as we are, to so great grace; that He has reconciled us who were His foes; that He has vouchsafed to us the spirit of adoption. Then ye say, 'It is meet and right:' for in giving thanks ye do a meet thing and right; but He did, not a right thing, but what was more than right, when He did us good, and counted us meet for such great benefits." [Cyril, Catech. Lect. xxiii. 3, 4.] These versicles are also referred to by St. Chrysostom [de Euch., de Pœnitentia], by St. Augustine [de Dono Perseverant. xiii.], and by Cæsarius of Arles [Hom. xii. xvi.].

SUSPENSION is a censure inflicted on a clerk, designed for remedial purposes, and taking away from him for a fixed time, or until he repents and makes satisfaction, the right of exercising his sacred functions in his office or benefice. The term is not earlier than the fourteenth century, but the discipline is far more ancient. Traces of it are found in councils of the sixth century; in some cases, as of an ordination before the canonical age, suspension was a penalty inflicted owing to the fault of another, as Honorius III. suspended a deacon until he should have attained the canonical age. There are three kinds of suspension: [1] ab ordine, where a clerk cannot exercise his ministry; [2] ab officio, where he is forbidden to exercise it in his charge or cure; [3] a beneficio, where he is deprived of the revenues of his benefice and any control over it. In all these cases the incumbent retains his order, rank, and benefice in distinction to the penalties of solemn deposal and degradation, by which he forfeits all rights of his order and benefice. Deposal is a degradation from which on repentance the person punished may be restored; irregularity is where a person is deprived of the exercise of the order which he holds, and also of promotion to one higher; interdict is where a person is forbidden to enter within a church door for a certain time.

Suspension is either total or partial: that is, [1] it may involve temporary deprivation of both orders and benefices, or one or the other; or [2] it may touch only certain orders or an office separable from a benefice. Suspension in one church is continuous in all others; if it is inflicted for breach of duty in a lower order, it does not affect the discharge of the duties of a higher order, although if it suspend from lower orders received, it precludes the reception of the higher. Suspension must be inflicted only in cases which do not merit deposal, and those which can be punished adequately by its infliction. Every clerk is amenable to it, and specially where public rumour ascribes to him some crime worthy of deposal, in order that the charge may be sifted. All persons who can excommunicate can suspend. Suspension must be preceded by a monition, and its cause must be stated in the formal act; "forasmuch as you have been proved to have committed such and such things, therefore we suspend you from the office and execution of your orders." To disobey a sentence of suspension involves the greater excommunication; it involves irregularity, except in the case of minor clerks. Every act of jurisdiction, such as absolution, is null and void during suspension, if it has been publicly announced, but the ministration of Holy Baptism or of Holy Communion is valid.

Suspension is removed by absolution, by revocation of the sentence, by expiry of the time of its continuance, by dispensation. [André, Du Droit Canonique, i. 943; ii. 1110. Maillane, Du Droit Canonique, v. 352.]

SWEDENBORGIANISM. A very peculiar school of mysticism which has been gradually congealing into a sect, and which originated with Emanuel Swedberg, popularly known as Swedenborg, in the middle of the eighteenth century. Among its adherents Swedenborgianism is known as "the New Church," or "the Church of the New Jerusalem."

Swedenborg was the son of a Swedish Lutheran bishop of a noble (though not properly a titled) family, and was born at Stockholm in the year 1688. He was a man of high education and great powers of research, and pursued the study of philosophy and the physical sciences with such industry that his writings on those subjects fill as many as twenty-seven volumes. He was, however, a great theorist, and his logical faculty was, to say the least, imperfectly trained. This latter defect seems to have characterized Bishop Swedenborg also, for his ideas respecting the Holy Bible went to the extreme extent of disapproving the use of any names not taken out of its pages.

When he was far past the meridian of life, Swedenborg gave up his philosophical studies and all secular pursuits, and devoted himself to the development of what he believed to be a new revelation; his extremely ready pen being henceforth given up to theology. "I have been called," he wrote, "to a holy office by the Lord Himself, who most graciously manifested Himself before me, His servant, in the year 1745, and then opened my sight into the spiritual world, and gave me to speak with spirits and angels, even as I do to this day. From that time I began to publish the many arcana which I have either seen, or which have been revealed to me, concerning heaven and hell, concerning the state of man after death, concerning true Divine worship, and concerning the spiritual sense of the word, besides other things of the highest importance conducive to salvation and wisdom" [Letter to Hartley, A.D. 1769]. He retired from the service of the King of Sweden, with a full pension, after having been in office for thirty-one years; and from thenceforth, until his death in the year 1771, he looked upon himself as the inspired prophet of the "New Church." His Arcana Cœlestia, a mystical exposition of Genesis and Exodus, in eight quarto volumes, was published between A.D. 1749 and 1756. It was, like his other works, written in Latin, but was translated some time afterwards by Mr. Clowes, rector of St. John's, Manchester. Two years after its completion he wrote five works containing what professed to be a newly revealed Eschatology, his information on the subject of the unseen world being alleged to be founded on his experience of several visits there, and on his communications with angels and departed spirits. Just before his death he printed his True Christian Religion, or the Universal Theology of the New Church, which was translated by Mr. Hartley, rector of Winwick, in Northumberland, one of the earliest of the English Swedenborgians. When he lived in England his residence was in the East of London, near to the then Swedish chapel in Princes Square, Ratcliffe Highway, where he lies buried.

Swedenborg did not form a sect, but rather tried to do what Comte has since attempted, to found a new philosophy of religion, which should be absorbed by all sects and schools of thought, and assimilate them to his ideal of the "New Church." But after his death the influence of his writings began to extend, and a small community of his followers formed themselves into a sect in the year 1788, with a meeting-house in Great Eastcheap, London, and under the leadership of a Clerkenwell printer named Robert Hindmarsh. During the three quarters of a century which has since elapsed, the number of English Swedenborgians has never reached five thousand, but the writings of their founder have a certain attraction for many minds, and influence large numbers who do not actually join the sect. A Swedenborg Society was founded in the year 1810 for the publication of his writings, and it is chiefly by means of this Society that the sect is kept up. In late years they have adopted a somewhat magnificent ritual, adapted from that of the Church of England and of the Lutheran communities. In Germany his mysticism has, at times, found many followers. Jung Stilling [A.D. 1740-1817] reproduced his spirit-seeing pretensions, and Oetinger [A.D. 1702-1782] much of his theosophy. Hagenbach says that Swedenborg's ideas "spread over a great part of Germany" [Hagenb. Hist. of Doctr. sec. 277] "in the course of the eighteenth century."

Swedenborg was not consciously an impostor, but a dreamy mystic, with such an overpowering self-consciousness as led him to believe that his religious speculations were special revelations: in which sense they are also accepted by his followers. He was probably, also, in some degree insane, for he professed at times to be so surrounded with spirits, visible to him, that he could scarcely find room in his study to move about among them. His peculiar mysticism seems to have been, at first, a reaction from Lutheran Solifidianism, and was all along very much coloured by his scientific speculations. He was extremely bitter against the dogma of Justification by faith alone, which he looked upon as provocative of Antinomian immorality; but he erroneously considered belief in that dogma to be a result of belief in the doctrine of the Trinity. His Antitrinitarian theories were similar to those of the followers of Praxeas and the early Sabellians, as regards the Person of our Lord, viz. that the One God appeared, at the time of the Incarnation, in the form of Christ; and the Holy Spirit he regarded as the Spirit of redeemed humanity. Among his other strange opinions, Swedenborg held that the Second Advent of our Lord had already come to pass, the Last Judgment having taken place in the year 1757, when the former heaven and earth, that is the Old Church, passed away, and all things entered upon a process of renovation through the foundation of "the Church of the New Jerusalem." He explained that Christ had not come in person, but "in the power and glory of the spiritual sense of His Holy Word, which is Himself." This Second Advent was effected by means of His servant Emanuel Swedenborg, before whom He manifested Himself in person, and whom He filled with His Spirit to teach the doctrines of the New Church by the word from Him." The resurrection of the dead he interpreted as merely the emancipation of the living soul from the dead body, the disembodied souls of good men becoming angels immediately after death, or (if not perfectly good) after passing through an intermediate state of purgatorial existence.

It may be doubted whether Swedenborg ever made acquaintance with Catholic theology, ancient or modern. His speculative mysticism looks very much like the result of long and deep original thinking in a mind biassed by Lutheran education in early life, and some tincture of materialistic philosophy in later days, but wholly unacquainted with any theology except that current among the Lutherans of his time. [Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

SYMBOL. A primitive name for the Creed, which is found, among other earlier writers, in St. Cyprian [Ep. 76], Ruffinus [De Symbolo], St. Augustine [De Fide et Symbolo], and St. Hilary [De Trin. xii.]. The ecclesiastical origin of the term is much disputed, but its most probable meaning was that of a contract, or bond of our faith. [CREEDS.] The term is also occasionally used for the "elements" used in the celebration of the Eucharist.

SYNCRETISM. Syncretism was a word coined by the inhabitants of Crete, a turbulent, quarrelsome race, who when any common danger threatened them acted pro tempore as hearty allies; "and this," says Plutarch [vii. 910, ed. Reiske], "was called by them συγκρητισμός." To derive the word therefore from συγκεράννυμι, and to make it equivalent to "Eclecticism," is a manifest error. It is a word that not unfrequently occurs in the writings of the German reformers, who, however greatly they varied among themselves, opposed a closely united front to the common foe. They learned it however first from Erasmus [Adag. Amicitia], who made use of the expression in writing to Melanchthon, "æquum est nos quoque συγκρητίζειν" [Corp. Ref. i. 77]. These tactics were commended by Bucer, Zwingli, Camerarius and Melanchthon [Corp. Ref. i. 917, ii. 485; Opp. Zwinglii, vii. 390, viii. 577; Opp. Melanch., Wittemb. iv. 813], and raised the ire of Ursinus, "Syncretismus enim quidam et conspiratio est contra Deum et Christum ejus" [Opp. Ursin. ii. 305]. In the sixteenth century the word was "mediæ significationis," and both used and abused. Where the union that it denotes was practical, the term was adopted readily in a good sense; where such was impossible it was repudiated, as a name for all that was lax and unprincipled. In the seventeenth century [A.D. 1645] George Calixtus, a Lutheran divine of the University of Helmstadt, professing a deep veneration for primitive tradition, proposed the union of all who agreed in the fundamental verities of the Apostles' Creed, and to treat all other doctrines as non-essential, his great aim being union of churches and a wide toleration. He was violently attacked by the two opposite parties, the Romanist calling him Calvinistic, the Lutheran reviling him as a Papist, and both parties agreed in corrupting the term Syncretist into "Sünde-Christ," "Sin-Christian." Grotius had already imagined a similar fusion of religious thought in one common Christianity. The fight of Syncretism continued till A.D. 1686, the year in which Calovius died. The term may be held to apply to any well meaning but weak attempt to combine in one system opposite and contradictory theological opinions. The Jesuit Erbermann, in his Εἰρηνικὸν Catholicum, says that Calixtus endeavoured not only to unite discordant religious views in one body, but religions also themselves that were diametrically opposed to each other; "foris εἰρήνη intus ἐριννύς," as Dannhauer described it. [Mysterium Syncretismi Detecti, 1648. Calovii, H. Syncretistica. Herzog's art. by Henke. Hallam's Introd. to L. H. Eur. II. iii. 18.]

SYNOD. The term σύνοδος is interpreted by Cyril the Grammarian as συναγωγὴ, συνέλευσις, πολλῶν παρουσία. In classical acceptation it signifies a πανήγυρις, public feast, &c. It was used by the LXX. in 1 Sam. x. 5, for חבל, a "band" or "company," Jer. ix. 2, for עצרת, "assembly;" and by Symmachus in Psa. lxxxii. 1, for עצרה, "congregation," and Joel i. 14, "solemn assembly." In the Apostolical Constitutions [v. 19] it denotes the assembly of the faithful; while in the Apostolical Canons [Ap. Canons, III.] it is first ordained that a "synod" of bishops shall be held twice in the year [can. xxx. COUNCILS, p. 158]; from which time the Councils of the Eastern Church were always termed "synods."

The history of the principal COUNCILS down to that of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, has been given in a former article; the present will epitomize the constitutional history of synods.

Synods may be arranged under eight heads:—

1. Œcumenical, to which all bishops and principal dignitaries of the Church were summoned; the Bishop of Rome, as "Primus inter pares," presiding either in person or by his legates. But a synod ceased to be œcumenical if prematurely stopped, or if it failed to carry its objects out to a definite conclusion, or if its deliberations were interrupted by violence, as was the case in the "Robber" or false Council of Ephesus, A.D. 449.

2. General, either of the Eastern or Western Church; such was the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, which was raised to œcumenical rank by the assent of the Western bishops who were absent.

3. National synods, as African, under the primacy of the Bishop of Carthage; Spanish, under the Archbishop of Toledo; or Syrian, under the Patriarch of Antioch.

4. Provincial, under the metropolitan and his suffragans.

5. United synods of several provinces, the incumbent of the principal see of the province in which it is held presiding.

6. Diocesan synods of the bishop and his clergy.

7. Casual synods, such as the σύνοδος ἐν δημοῦσαι of Constantinople, to which the patriarch summons "pro re nata" any bishops who chanced to be present in the metropolis.

8. Mixed synods of clergy and laity, by no means unfrequent in the Middle Ages, which were summoned and presided over by the king. Such was the Conference at Streneshalch [Whitby, A.D. 664], at which the Abbess Hilda was present; as was her successor Ælfleda, daughter of King Oswy, at a Northumbrian Council. These synods were frequently divided into two chambers, the prelates and nobility being separated, and the former alone taking cognizance of purely ecclesiastical questions. The result of these deliberations was usually embodied in a royal decree or constitution.

Local synods were summoned by the prince, or by the ecclesiastical head of the district or province, or in the case of a mixed synod by the incumbent of the principal see. Œcumenical synods were originally convened by the emperor, who was generally present either in person or by deputy; as in the first eight œcumenical synods, all of which were held in the East. The seventh of these was summoned by the Empress Irene, at the instance of the Patriarch of Constantinople [Nic. II. A.D. 787]. The custom of providing travelling expenses, equipages and maintenance from the royal exchequer dates from the example set by Constantine at the Council of Nicæ. Some of the synods summoned in later times by the Popes have been called œcumenical, but are only to be regarded as such in a very qualified sense.

The constituents of diocesan synods were [a] those whom the bishop was obliged to summon; [b] those whom the bishop might, if he pleased, cite; [c] those who were only summoned for some special purpose: all however who were cited were bound, if possible, to appear. Citation to general synods reached the suffragan bishops through the metropolitan, who appeared attended by a select few of those named. It was a peculiarity of the African Church that not only the ordinary clergy, but the laity also were present at its synods, though they had no voice either in deliberation or in voting. In later times the same practice was allowed in the Spanish and Gallican Churches.

At the Synod of Antioch [A.D. 264-5], which condemned Paul of Samosata, bishops attended with their priests and deacons [Euseb. H. E. vii. 28]; but they do not appear to have voted. He was judged by his peers. In synods of the succeeding century priests and deacons were also present, the latter not being allowed to sit; and in some few instances they signed the synodal decrees and acts immediately after their bishop, who added ὁρίσας, or "definiens," to his subscription as marking his right of voting. Priests who were the representatives of absent bishops had equal rights with the episcopal members. The notaries employed were usually deacons, though laymen were also employed. Learned men also were occasionally summoned as assessors. Thus Thomas Aquinas was cited to the fourteenth General Council by Gregory X.

It is impossible to deny that precedence was allowed in general synods to the bishops of Rome and their legates; and Hefele shews that they in general presided [Concil. i. p. 25-37]; the only true exceptions being the Council of Constantinople [A.D. 381], which was not originally œcumenical, being composed only of Eastern bishops. There Meletius, Patriarch of Antioch first, and on his death Gregory of Nazianzum, and afterwards Nectarius, presided. Also the fifth General Council, at which neither pope nor emperor were represented. Eutychius therefore, Patriarch of Constantinople, directed its proceedings. In the Council of Nicæ, Hosius, Bishop of Cordova, with Vitus and Vincentius, Roman presbyters, were the προέδροι of whom Eusebius speaks, and represented the Roman bishop [V. Const. iii. 13]. Gelasius of Cyzicum, writing in the next century a history of the Council of Nicæ, says, "Hosius occupied the place of the Bishop of Rome at Nice, having the two Roman presbyters Vito and Vincentius as his assessors" [Act. Conc. Nic.]. Their signatures accordingly were first in order, taking precedence of all superior patriarchs and metropolitans [Hefele, i. p. 37]. All the Western councils after the eighth General Synod were held under the presidency of the popes or their legates. The acts of œcumenical councils were ratified conjointly by imperial as well as pontifical authority [Hefele, i. 38-43]. After the eighth General Council the papal influence was paramount, the imperial becoming scarcely perceptible.

The question whether the authority of an œcumenical synod ranged above or below that of the Pope was first opened out by the Councils of Constance [A.D. 1414-18] and Basle [A.D. 1431], which declared for the collective voice of the Church, the Gallican Church having since maintained this decision. Pope Eugenius IV. however reversed the decree by a special constitution of September 4th, 1439, in the Council of Florence. Synodal infallibility is claimed on the authority of John xvi. 13, xiv. 26; Matt. xxviii. 20, xvi. 18; Acts xv. 28. The same Councils of Constance and Basle decided that an immoral or heterodox pope might be deposed; which, however, Bellarmine restricts to the case of heresy, whereby the Pope would cease to belong to the Church, from whence immorality alone cannot expel him [Bellarm. De R. Pont. ii. 30; De Conc. ii. 19]. Another important alteration was introduced in the Council of Constance; that the voting which hitherto had been conducted numerically, owing to the great preponderance of Italian bishops, should be by nations. The Italian, Gallican, German, Spanish and Anglican nationalities represented single votes, although the majority decided the voice of each nation. A division also of the council into four great committees was a great improvement as regarded the dispatch of business: these discussed matters of faith, the peace of the Church, reform, and miscellaneous business. At Trent the council recurred to the old numerical system of voting, but discussed everything in committee, so that each question was virtually settled before it was put to the vote in the aggregate meeting. The solemnities to be observed on opening and closing a council are prescribed in detail by the fourth canon of the fourth Council of Toledo [Harduin, Conc. i. 6, iii. 580].

The earliest collections of synodal acts were those of Merlin, Paris, 1523; Crabbe, Cologne, 1538, and a second edition 1551; Surius, Cologne, 1567; Binius, Cologne, 1606, 1618, and Paris, 1636. The Acts of the General Councils, with an introduction by the Jesuit Sirmond, appeared at Rome, 1608-1612, and formed the basis for succeeding compilations, but omitted, by Bellarmine's advice, the acts of the Council of Basle. The Collectio Regia, Paris, 1644, greatly enlarged and improved them, and extended to thirty-seven folios. This was succeeded by the collection commenced by the Jesuit Labbé and completed by Cossart, and published at Paris, 1674, in seventeen folios; to which Baluze prepared a supplement in four vols., the first of which only was published. The Jesuit Harduin's edition, profiting by the labours of preceding editors, appeared at Paris in 1715, in twelve folios, but had a hard struggle for existence in its first years, owing to the editor's maintenance in the dedication of the Bull Unigenitus, and the consequent opposition of the Jansenists. It is an invaluable collection of synodal literature. Coleti's edition appeared at Venice, 1728-1734, in twenty-three folios, with two additional volumes of supplemental matter; enlarged subsequently by Mansi, 1748-1762, in six folios. Mansi's subsequent Florence edition of 1759, in thirty-one folio volumes, is far superior to all preceding collections, being enriched with many valuable notes and dissertations. It unfortunately reaches only to the fifteenth century, and being incomplete has no kind of index.

The acts of British and Irish Councils have been published by Spelman, London, 1639-1664; and more completely by Wilkins, London, 1734, in four folio volumes. [Cabassutius, Not. Concil. Labbé, Synopsis H. Concil. Walch, K. Versamml. Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. Migne, Dict. d. Conc. Suicer's Thesaurus, art. σύνοδος. · Bingham, Eccl. Antiq. II. xvi. xvii., XVI. i. Dupin. Cave. Ceillier. Salmon. Hefele, Concilien Gesch., from whence the above account has been principally drawn.]

T

TALMUD. The Talmud is essentially the ground on which JUDAISM is built. If this basis were swept away the entire fabric would crumble into ruin. The history of the Talmud is the history of the people since the days of Ezra to that of the final completion of Gemara, at the close of the fifth century of the Christian era. The people had borne with them from the Jordan to the Euphrates very much the same character as the tribes that Joshua led into the land of promise. But three generations of captivity wrought a greater change in their nature than had been effected by twelve times that number of generations in the preceding ages, and new features were developed through contact with Magianism, the germ of which we seek for in vain in the Law and in the Prophets. The great men raised up by Providence to lead the Jews back to the land of their inheritance stamped upon them an apparently indelible character. A minute interpenetration of the whole daily life of Judaism by the principles of the Law was the object at which Ezra and Nehemiah aimed, and a scrupulous observance of its precepts, with Messianic hopes for the future, became the spirit of Judaism. As Moses represented the Law and the Prophets, so Ezra is the type of Talmudic and traditional religion. Ritualistic observance, in its most minute particulars, was made binding on the people, the bearings of the Law were readjusted by HALACOTH, while a more spiritual instruction was called forth in MIDRASHIM, or Scriptural expository addresses, under the Great Synagogue [B.C. 530-320]. The order of Scribes (Sopherim) was devoted to public instruction. It was the foundation of Rabbinism. Their dicta are quoted in the Talmud (Dibre Sopherim) as of higher import than the Law, and their successors were mentioned by our Lord as still sitting in "Moses' seat." Their office grew out of a precept of the Law, that stands in immediate connection with the Shema, "Hear, O Israel!" [Deut. vi. 6-10] whereby each man was bound to make himself acquainted with the Law, and serve as a guide to others. The learned body of men that hence grew up were separate from the "people of the earth" only by their great erudition: socially they were engaged in every kind of handicraft.

The Tanaim, or teachers of traditional lore, succeeded the men of the Great Synagogue [B.C. 320—A.D. 190]. The Jews had shewn considerable plasticity since the exile in adapting themselves to various phases of life. Many families of Israel had dispersed among the most thriving cities of the civilized world, and their rulers, dreading any hankering after pagan ways, hedged them in by a system of traditional principles and constitutions deduced from the written Law by succeeding generations of Tanaim. These HALACOTH, the groundwork of the Mishna, were applications of the Law to the living habits and religious instincts of the people. The causes that led to their embodiment in the MISHNA are found under that heading [see also MIDRASH]. The Mishna is the foundation of the Talmud, though this name is often restricted to the Gemara, which, together with the Mishna, forms the Talmud properly so called. The Mishna not having exhausted its material, the surplusage was collected by Rabbi Chaia and Rabbi Hoshaia in a compilation termed Tosaphta, "addenda;" passages of which, cited afterwards in the Gemara, are introduced with the distinctive word "Tana," 'he teaches,' meaning Judah the Holy, the compiler of the Mishna, or by "vetani 'aleh," 'thereupon it is taught.' The Baraitha, or "Extravagantes," as lying without the letter of the Mishna, is quoted more indefinitely by the heading "Tanu Rabbinan," 'our Rabbins have taught;' "Tani chada," 'a certain one has taught;' "Tannia," 'we have a tradition;' or "Mathnitha," 'it is a Mishna;' and these passages contain doctrine that is authoritative, unless traversed by the text of some Mishna. The books Sifra a Midrash on Leviticus, Sifri on Numbers and Deuteronomy, and the Mechiltha on Exodus are of the Baraitha. These outlying works, with the Mishna, formed subjects for daily discussion among the schools of Palestine and Babylon. After the date of the Mishna the teachers were no longer termed "Tanaim," but "Amoraim," or speakers; the Amora having been the Tana's mouthpiece to the class, as the Methurgeman, or interpreter, in the days of the Great Synagogue. The word "Eithmar," 'it is said,' serves to introduce the Amora's utterance in the Gemara. This addition, in due course, from "Gamar," 'to make complete,' denotes the completion of the whole code of the Jewish Law, whether written or traditional. The Mishna contains in shorter theses a digest of the whole body of Jewish civil and ecclesiastical law, framed upon the Hilkoth of the wise, and authoritative Midrashim; the Gemara consists of more discursive comments on the various Mishnaioth, as expounded by different doctors of the rabbinical schools. It contains also the main body of HAGGADOTH, of which the Mishna has comparatively little. These Haggadoth have been collected and published, with a commentary, by Samuel Jafe [Venice, 1590], to which Löwe added a glossary of terms [Berlin, 1725]. Hence then in course of time it became absolutely necessary that this aftergrowth should be committed to writing. The addition of these commentaries on the Mishna, obtained principally from the school of Tiberias, constituted the "Jerushalmi" Talmud. The compilation of this work thus formed of Mishna and Gemara is assigned by tradition to Rabbi Jochanan ben Eliezer, otherwise known as Bar Naphcha, the blacksmith's son. It was probably commenced by him about A.D. 260, but completed by succeeding hands, A.D. 340. It is termed in the "Babli" Talmud "the Doctrine of the land of Israel," and "the Gemara of the sons of the West." The Gemara is an elaborate discussion in Socratic form on the words of the Mishna; its meaning is cleared, and antagonisms are resolved [Jarchi]. But the Jerusalem Gemara was incomplete. Of the six Mishnic Sedarim only four were elaborated: Zeraim, Moed, Nashim, and Nezikin. The treatise Nidda is also added, and sundry fragments in keeping with the similar addenda of the Mishna. The language of the Jerusalem Talmud is Mishnical Hebrew, with a rough strain of the Western Aramaic dialect of Palestine, shewing how rapidly the language had degenerated since the date of Judah the Holy. This also gives probability to Jost's conjecture, that one reason why the Mishna was ever written, contrary to the precept of the elders, was that the Hebrew language might be preserved from total deterioration. The text of the Mishna was kept in close accordance with that of Judah the Holy, from which the Babylonian departed under the corrections of Eastern Gemarists. But the Jerusalem Gemara was not sufficiently exhaustive, or altogether outspoken on the subject of Christianity. A second Gemara therefore was put forth at Babylon, which with the original Mishna forms the authoritative Talmud, the growth of many centuries. If the Jerusalem Talmud is of uncertain origin this was not the case with the "Talmud Babli." It was the work of Rabbi Ashi [Isaiah] ben Simai, who was born at Sora, A.D. 351, and the term Talmud was first accredited in the name by which he was distinguished, "Master of the Talmud" (Morch Talmud). But matter still went on accumulating. At the early age of twenty-three Ashi was appointed head of the school of Sora, and a long rectorship of fifty-two years gave him time for the preparation of the Eastern or Babylonian Gemara. His rise was coincident with the fall of the school of Tiberias, which never again rose to eminence; and the oppressed Jews of Palestine then migrated in large numbers to Sora and Pum-Baditha.[1] His first care was to enlarge the school buildings, and to attract to it students; and Sora soon became the high school of Babylon and the most renowned seat of Rabbinism in the East. He then undertook the formidable task of reducing to order the entire body of traditional law. In every year from A.D. 370, at the great feasts, he assembled the most learned men among the Jews of the East, and questioned them with respect to their traditional practices and expositions. A vast mass of material thus came under his hand. Next, in every half-year, he took a particular treatise of the Mishna, and set down the various data furnished by his class as current in their respective localities. Thus he went through the Mishna section after section, the testimony of the majority being decisive, and rough hewed out the Babylonian Gemara. The Jerusalem Gemara, as the Abbé Chiarini observes, shews by internal evidence that it was written for an agricultural community, that of Babylon for a nation of merchant traders. The Mishna being composed of sixty-three treatises, the work was spread over thirty years. At the end of this period he revised the entire collection, carefully correcting errors and supplementing omissions, during twenty-two years, so that when he died in his seventy-fifth year, the Gemara, as it now stands, had been created by him, with the exception of a small remnant of matter that was added by his friend and helpmate in the work of recension, Rabbi Abina. Other rabbinical testimony [Rabbi Gedaliah, Shalsheleth Hakkabala, and Sherira Gaon, Juchasin] asserts that the Gemara was only completed by Rabbi Jose in the twenty-fourth year of his rectorate at Pum-Baditha [A.D. 500]. But in any case Rabbi Ashi was to the Babylonian school what Jehudah the Holy had been to that of Palestine. He created the Mishna, Rabbi Ashi the authoritative Gemara. Each, therefore, was distinguished by his own peculiar title of honour; Jehudah was Rabbi or Rabbenû, Ashi was Rabban. The Massechtoth Ketanoth, or minor treatises, form an appendix to the Gemara. They are seven in number, to which are sometimes added "Hilkoth eretz Israel," directions for slaughtering meats, and a commentary by Rabbi Nathan on the Treatise Aboth, in lieu of its Gemara, which is wanting.

The language of the "Talmud Babli" is debased with foreign and barbarous terms and grammatical solecisms in a much higher degree than its Western predecessor. The Haggadic narratives resemble more closely the vernacular Aramaic, shewing their origin in ordinary folks-lore. The Halacoth are in Mishnic Hebrew, carrying evidence of higher date. The style is so exceedingly concise as to make the sense that it contains a microscopic study. The difficulties indeed of the Gemara are so great, that no one need expect to master them thoroughly who has not drawn in Gemara with his mother's milk. The study of the Talmud presumes a thorough knowledge also of the Hebrew Bible, a single word often indicating an entire passage. The wonderful moral confusion of the Talmud, the mixed character of which may be detected in every page, is nowhere more strikingly exemplified than in the prayer put by the Gemarist into the mouth of Rabbi Nechoniah ben Hakkana [Berachoth, 28, B.], on entering the school, or Beth Midrash, and quitting it again in the evening. In the morning, the prayer runs: "I beseech Thee that no scandal may occur through fault of mine, and that I err not in matters of Halacah, so as to cause my colleagues to exult. May I not call impurity pure, or purity impure; and may my colleagues not blunder in matters of Halacah, that I may have no cause to triumph over them." The prayer is worthy of an honest rabbi, and there is something of the publican's humility in its sentiments. The evening prayer is wholly that of the harsh and arrogant Pharisee: "I thank Thee that Thou hast given me my portion among those who have a seat in the Beth Midrash, and that Thou hast not cast my lot among those who sit in the corner. I early rise, and they early rise; but I rise to the service of the Law, they rise for vanity. I labour, and they also labour, but I labour and receive a recompense; they labour, but receive nothing. I hasten, and they also hasten; but I hasten in the direction of the world to come, they hasten towards the pit of destruction." The sweet water and bitter can scarcely have flowed from the same source. Mahomet, notwithstanding his antipathy for the Jews as a people, borrowed many of his ideas and expressions from the Talmud, as shewn by Geiger [Was hat Mahommed aus dem Judenthume genommen]; while its medical lore was largely drawn upon by Averroes and Avicenna.

[1] So named from its position on the debouchment (Pûm, mouth) of the canal (Baditha) of communication between the Tigris and the Euphrates.

Such then is the Talmud. In its origin it was the result of an almost necessary development. Starting with the axiom that the law of Moses is binding on the children of Abraham in every generation, its precepts have been applied to the changing habits and customs of the Jews in different ages and under various climates—by a literal interpretation when possible, otherwise on the ci-près principle, rarely by giving a new direction to its enactments, as instanced under the HILLEL régime. It is this application of the Law to the needs of Jewish society, by a process slow and gradual, that has made each successive stage of development, in Jewish opinion, more valuable than its predecessors. Thus if the Law has been likened to water, the Mishna, which gave a later direction to its precepts, is as wine; and the Gemara, declaring as it does the sense in which the Mishnic Hilkoth are to be taken, is as hippocras. It is not that the Law is less, or that the traditional decisions and expository matter are more sacred, but the latest phase of judicial interpretation is the most binding; and where the rule of action is clear and decisive, no antecedent utterance need trouble the inquirer. Yet the Talmud has always been antiquated. It has never known the sunshine of youth. It has still been the mouldering moss-grown ruin. In its origin it presupposed vital action where there was nothing but death; Temple service with the Temple hopelessly in ruins, "not one stone upon another;" sacrificial rites that were impossible without an altar, and for which certain prayers were substituted, carefully numbered out, and made binding on the individual in lieu of public offering. To the Jews of the dispersion it spoke in like manner of duties that could only be discharged in ancient Palestine. It bound, indeed, each shred of Judaism in its position; threads crossing each other, and decussating in every community throughout the world, formed web and woof that enveloped every part of the system as in a tabernacle, coarse in nature but beyond measure strong. The Talmud stood at first on holy ground, and its ordinances were framed accordingly; the observance of which has become impossible within the boundaries of Gebal and Ammon and Amalek. But nothing can be more completely out of place than strict Talmudism amid the complications of modern society; it is impossible to make its precepts consist with the social and political duties of the highly educated Jew. Our Lord, Who came not to destroy the Law but to fulfil it, has pointed out those modes of dealing with the Law in its higher and more spiritual bearings, that in the end must be accepted by Israel as his truest wisdom. Rabbinism, which before the completion of the Talmud possessed the organism and plastic energy of life, has become since that date stiff and stark as a petrifaction. There is no longer any room for freedom of will or independence of judgment. Everything must be made square with the "oral law."

The following is a brief conspectus of the contents of the Talmud:—

Sedarim.	Massichtoth.	Perakim.	Mishnaioth.
Seraim	11	75	654
Moed	12	88	681
Nashim	7	71	572
N'sikin	10	74	689
Kodashim	11	91	590
Taharoth	12	126	1001
	63	525	4187

The chequered fortunes of the Jewish people in Europe have caused MSS. of the Talmud to be rare. The late Dr. Pinner, after a six years' search through the libraries of Europe, could find only one that was complete in all its parts; it was written in the fourteenth century, and is preserved in the Royal Library at Munich. Another that belonged to Reuchlin is defective, and is part of the Grand Ducal Library at Carlsruhe. The libraries of Spain have yielded no copies to the plunderer; but the Polish Jews, who only give their daughters in marriage to competent Talmudists, may possibly be able to produce MSS. of venerable antiquity. The Talmud has been repeatedly printed, but the same causes that have made the MSS. so rare have thinned down the earliest editions. Separate treatises were printed as early as A.D. 1464 at the press of the Soncini. The first complete edition of the Babylonian Talmud was worked off by Bomberg at Venice, A.D. 1520, in twelve large folio vols. Froben followed, A.D. 1579, with the Basle edition. In the next centuries editions appeared at Cracow, 1603; Lublin, 1617-22; Amsterdam, in 4to, 1644, and other places down to 1847, in which year the Venetian edition was published. It is a copy of the uncastrated text; for in many of the earlier editions all passages hostile to the Christian religion, as well as the entire treatise, Avoda Zara, were carefully expunged by the censor. The copy formerly owned by Selden, still preserved in the Bodleian Library [II. Arch. Seld. 7-19], appears by its numerous erasures to have been prepared for the press. The first impression of the Jerusalem Talmud appeared at Venice soon after the Babylonian, A.D. 1523; an earlier edition without date was printed at the same place by Bomberg.

Four excellent translations of the Mishna exist; that of Surenhusius in Latin; of Abraham ben Ruben in Spanish [1606, Venice]; of Rabe in German [6 parts 4to, 1760, Ausbach]; and that of Jost in German [6 vols. 4to, Berlin, 1832]. Several of the treatises are to be found in an English form; such as the Shabbath and Eruvin by Dr. Wotton, A.D. 1718; the Pirke Avoth in the Jewish Prayer Book by Rabbi Young; and a volume of selected treatises by the learned Rabbis De Sola and Raphall. The French translation of Beracheth by the Abbé Chiarini is also of great use; the general reader may see in it the structure of the entire Talmud. Treatises of the Jerusalem Talmud, with Latin translations, are to be found in vols xvii. xviii. xx. xxv. xxx. of Ugolino's Thesaurus; and in vols xix. xxv. the treatises Zebachim, Menachoth and Sanhedrin, from the Babylonian Talmud, also with Latin translations. The Yad Hakhazakah, by Maimonides, in six vols fol., and the Perush Hammishna, in four vols fol., from their extreme bulkiness are impossible books to ordinary students; but his preface to the treatise Zeraim is a valuable help to the rabbinical student, as is also the introduction to the Talmud by Rabbi Shemuel Hannagid. Dr. Pinner has embodied the substance of these two last works in his Einleitung in den Talmud, Berlin, 1842. There is also his useful Compendium d. Talmud. Schröder's Satzungen u. Gebräuche des Talm. may also be mentioned as a serviceable book; as also Dr. Pinner's preface to the Beracheth. A defence of the Talmud is found in Salvador's Jésus Christ et sa Doctrine. See also the exhaustive article in Herzog, Thalmud, and articles to be found respectively in the Quarterly Review for October 1867 and in the closing number of the Christian Remembrancer.

TARGUM. When the Jews were driven as captives to Babylon, they returned to the early cradle of their race. The fifty generations that had passed away since the call of Abraham had made comparatively little change there in language. But that of the migratory Hebrew stock had become stained with the variation of each soil, in Canaan, in Egypt, and again amid the seafaring tribes of Philistia. The written word at length, as in the case of our own translation, gave fixity to the language. Three generations lived during the Captivity, and the younger stock that returned were Chaldee in their language, though that language only acquired its definite bearings after the return to the land of promise; but Hebrew continued to be the sacred tongue of Scripture, and was still used by the prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, with an intermixture of Chaldee in Daniel and Ezra. Hence the Chaldee or Aramaic dialect of Jerusalem was not one with that of Babylon, while that of Antioch on the Orontes at a later period differed from both. It now became necessary that the sacred books should be interpreted for synagogue use. This was done in the modern vernacular dialect, and traditional glosses and interpretations increased in number as the Hebrew fell more into desuetude. It was forbidden at first to commit them to writing [Maimonides], as in the case of the Halacoth that eventually formed the written Mishna; but at length they were written. Their use was partly for instruction in the Beth Midrash, or school, and partly for a guidance to the Methurgeman, or interpreter of the Law in public service; partly also to serve as a check on the rapid influx of the hated Greek learning. Thus the written paraphrase originated. The Jerusalem Targum, as will be seen, gives just the idea of such a congeries of glosses and paraphrastic expositions on selected verses and passages of the Law. Though comparatively recent it was made up of older materials. As Targums multiplied the text has degenerated, one Targum being mended by another. The Targums are pointed in the Masoretic way, but not with the systematic regularity of the Hebrew Scriptures. Buxtorf, for correcting the punctuation of Onkelos in his rabbinical Bible, was accused of doing violence to the text.

The word Targum means "interpretation." Tirgem is "he interpreted," and Methurgeman is the interpreter, called also Turgeman (unde dragoman), Amora, or "spokesman," and more lately Darshan, "expositor." The office of Methurgeman rose to primary importance, and he was regularly appointed to his ministry. His exposition was extemporaneous, but in due course these interpretations and oral glosses upon the sacred text were collected together, and formed the basis of the various Targumim. The Talmud speaks of such translations [Tr. Jadaim, iv. 5], and prescribes the style and language that is suitable for them [Gemara on Tr. Shabbath, 115 A.]. In the same passage a Chaldee version of Job is mentioned as existing in the time of St. Paul's instructor Gamaliel, and it doubtless must have been preceded by some similar exposition of the Law [Häverniek, Einl. i. 79]. The Targum became a necessary accessory to the synagogue. Sections of the Law were read of convenient length, and then translated; the reader and the Methurgeman speaking "by course" [Zunz, Gottes d. V. p. 8]. But a freer scope was gradually assumed, which led to the more diffuse Midrash, when the exposition of the Law was once more restricted by the thirteen exegetical canons. [MISHNA.] Thus what the LXX. had been to the Alexandrian Jew, the Targum was to the Aramaic. Both grew out of the same necessity, and in very much the same manner. In both cases the first books to be translated were those of the Law, as of daily administrative use. The synagogue service required also a translation of the prophets, which in due course followed; and from the prophetic burthen the Darshan took the theme for his discourse. Our Lord's ministration in the synagogue at Nazareth is an exact representation of the Jewish service of the day. He "stood up for to read," and "there was delivered unto Him the book of the prophet Isaiah," when He proceeded according to custom to expound in it a particular passage. The particular section was the Haphtarah, corresponding with the fiftieth section of the Law, which would be read on the third Sabbath before the Rosh Hashanah, or commencement of the year with the November new moon.

The Targums were quite beyond the reach of the Fathers of the Church, neither did the Jews apply them in controversy; there is no room for wonder therefore that we hear nothing of these Chaldee paraphrases in the ecclesiastical writings of the Primitive Church. They were of no real authority, and the translator of the Peshito, as a Christian scholar, makes no use of them. The later Targums rather made use of the Peshito.

The oldest Targum is that of Onkelos on the Pentateuch. The author is mentioned in three or four places of the Talmud, but is confused with the Greek translator Aquila. "Onkelos, a proselyte, wrote a Targum on the Law" [Tr. Shabbath, 8]. One account makes him a disciple of Gamaliel, whom he buried sumptuously, having burned aromata to the amount of seventy minæ [Avoda Zara, 11, A.]. Another [Zohar, 131] makes him a pupil of Hillel, father of the Simeon who received our Lord in his arms on His presentation [Luke ii. 25], which assigns to him too early a date. He was probably a contemporary of our Lord, and wrote his paraphrase from the materials that a traditional exegesis had handed down. The comparative purity of style, approaching more nearly to the Biblical Chaldee of Ezra and Daniel, is evidence of its high date; also possibly that Babylon was the place of its birth; and the outspoken way in which it gives their true Messianic interpretation to Gen. xlix. 10 and Numb. xxiv. 17 agrees well with the supposition that it was compiled on the banks of the Euphrates, before the accomplishment of those prophecies in the Saviour of mankind had been generally known. As a version it is close, agreeing almost in the number of syllables with the original, and it is far less paraphrastic than its successors. It has few Greek terms, and nothing whatever of Latin. The poetic passages are amplified, and they are perhaps the earliest fragments around which the main context afterwards gathered.

The LXX. had already set the example of softening down the harsher anthropopathic expressions of the Hebrew Bible. Onkelos took the same course, and speaks throughout of the divine revelation being made mediately by the Word of God [Mimra da Jah], the Shechinah, glory, angel, &c. [cf. Targ. on Exod. xxxiii. 23]. Anything like juxtaposition of man with God is avoided; thus "Behold the man is become as one of us" [Gen. iii. 22], becomes, "Adam of himself is unity in the world," מִמֵּנּוּ being rendered with equal propriety by the third as by the first personal pronoun. "The people believed the Lord, and Moses His servant" [Exod. xiv. 31], becomes wholly limited to faith in God, by inserting "the prophesying of" Moses. In a critical point of view the agreement of this Targum with ancient versions, where they diverge from the received text, is an important mean for determining the ancient text of the Hebrew Scripture; yet ἅπαξ λεγόμενα are often represented by some equally obscure Chaldaism, and difficulties are left without explanation. The Philoxenus of S. D. Lusatta is an indispensable guide to its obscurities [Vienna, 1830]. Winer [De Onkeloso] has given an account of the known MSS. of this Targum. It was first printed at Bologna, A.D. 1482, and it occupies a position in the Complutensian and Antwerp Polyglotts. It is also printed in the Rabbinical Bibles in a parallel column with the Hebrew text.

The earliest Targum on the historical books and prophets was written by Jonathan ben Uzziel. He is mentioned in the Talmud as the greatest of twenty disciples of HILLEL, who held a middle position between thirty, on whom, as on Moses, the Shechinah rested, and thirty others for whom the sun might stand still [Baba Bathra, 134, A; cf. also Succa, 28, A]. A bird flying over him while engaged upon the Law, was burnt up as by fire; and when his Targum was published the earth quaked through a district of four hundred parasangs, and the Bath Col was heard saying, "Who hath revealed my secrets to the sons of men?" [Megillah, 3, A]. It is also stated, by an anachronism of three centuries, that he received his paraphrase direct from Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi; though this may merely mean that the Targum was given with the original, and handed down traditionally. Nothing for certain is known with respect to the time at which Jonathan lived, for no reliance can be placed on the later testimony of the Talmud. The style of his writing marks a later date than the Targum of Onkelos; though its purity, as compared with the other Targums, still shews that it may claim a high antiquity. Berthold refers it to the later part of the second century, and passages that bear the stamp of a yet later date are probably interpolations. Greek words, e.g. ἡγέμων [Judg. ix. 13], are found in it, but no Latin. The Targums give a modern application to ancient names in Scripture; and in this way Jonathan identifies Edom with Rome [Isa. xxxiv. 9], Gomer with Germany [Ezek. xxxviii. 6], though גרטניא, as in Targ. Jer. Gen. x. 2, may be the true reading; still even these instances need not imply a later date than the destruction of Jerusalem. The strange interpolation with reference to the host and camp of Sennacherib [Isa. x. 32] and of Sisera [Numb. v. 8] was not found in MSS. from whence the Complutensian text was printed. And Rashi warns us [Ezek. xlvii. 19] that the text has suffered from all the usual causes of corruption. Jonathan resolves poetical figures into the plainest prose, as was doubtless the practice of the Methurgeman, while the later prophets in their diffuse rendering assume an Haggadic character.[1] Like Onkelos he tones down all instances of anthropopathia; thus the "train" of the Lord [Isa. vi. 1] becomes His "glory," as adopted also by St. John [xii. 41]. Häverniek [Einl. A. T. sec. 80] gives satisfactory evidence of the unity of the several books of this Targum. Parallel passages are rewritten in the same words [cf. Isa. xxxvi.-xxxix. with 2 Kings xviii. 13, &c.; and Isa. ii. 2-4 with Micah iv. 1-3]; and the general likeness of the Haggadic touches indicate the work of the same hand. The strange three hundred and forty-threefold multiple of the solar strength, being the cube of seven [Isa. xxx. 26 and 2 Sam. xxiii. 4], could scarcely have suggested itself to two writers. It may be added that the fragmentary theory of Eichhorn, Berthold and Jahn, referring the several portions of this Targum to different writers, has been effectually disposed of by Gesenius [Comm. on Isa. § 11]. The writer's Christology is of a peculiar cast. He refers Isa. liii. to a suffering Messiah, Who should be wounded for His people's transgression and bruised for their iniquities, and submit for a moment to indignity that He might lead them on to a glorious destiny; an idea that was more fully worked up in the Talmud. Many passages are referred to the Messiah in this Targum which have their fulfilment in Christ [Gesen. on Isa. pp. 77, 78]; many also that have nothing Messianic about them are so interpreted. So again it agrees at times with the New Testament exegesis [Isa. xlii. 1; Matt. xii. 7], but elsewhere diverges [Zech. xii. 10]. The Targum Jonathan first appeared A.D. 1494 [Leiria], it next formed part of the Bomberg and Buxtorf rabbinical Bibles, and was adopted by the Antwerp, Paris, and London Polyglotts. Detached prophecies, variously combined, have been printed by the brothers Stephanus, as also by Van d. Hardt and J. D. Michaelis.

The two Targums of Jerusalem and Pseudo-Jonathan on the Pentateuch are of homogeneous origin, and were known to the ancients as the Palestine or Jerusalem Paraphrase [Hävernick, Einl. sec. 81]. The Jerusalem Targum appears to be a cento of marginal glosses and scholia on the Targum of Onkelos; containing also Haggadic elements from various rabbinical sources. As containing legends noticed by New Testament writers [compare 2 Tim. iii. 8 with Targ. Ex. vii. 11, and 1 Cor. x. 4 with Targ. Numb. xxi. 19], they may represent earlier fragmentary Targums. Of the two the Jerusalem Targum was probably the original; dealing with single words and isolated texts, and those in no connected order, to which the Targum of Pseudo-Jonathan gave consistency. In this way modern criticism [Zunz, Gottes d. Vortr. 66-72; Carpzov, Crit. Sacr. 448] resolves the latter into a mere development of the former, which was itself a collection of glosses on the Targum of Onkelos. In Deut. xxxiv. the paraphrase of Jonathan is a close copy of the Jerusalem Targum. In much the same manner the Gemara grew out of the refuse salvage of the Mishna. The later form cannot be earlier than the middle of the seventh century [Zunz, 73], and exhibits many intermediate marks of date between this period and the middle of the third. It mentions the Mishna, and speaks of Constantinople [Numb. xxiv. 19, 24], Lombardy, unknown as a name before A.D. 570, and borrows from the domestic history of Mahomet the names Chadidja and Fatima [Gen. xxi. 2].

The way in which MSS. vary indicates the patchwork character of these Targums, and the multiplicity of explanations that it offers on the authority of "ת"א, "other Targums," proves the same thing. Anthropomorphic expressions are toned down as in Onkelos. Thus "ye shall be as gods," rendered by Onkelos, "princes," becomes in the later Targum, "prince-angels," מלאכין רברבין; unless, indeed, the word "angels" come in from the margin. The stories are of the grossly absurd type of post-Talmudic Rabbinism; though some of its Haggadic myths are borrowed from the Gemara. Its angelology is that of the Cabbala, and ascribes the slaughter of the first-born in Egypt to a host of angels nine hundred strong; of whom Samuel was the generalissimo. Its description of a penal Gehenna is rabbinically graphic. Latin, Greek, and Persian words are freely intermixed in its texture, and modern ethnographical names occur in it. Its language is the most degenerate type of the Western Aramaic dialect, and abounds with barbarous words; as an exegetical work its only merit is that it is in some measure an exponent of the ideas of Onkelos. The style of the Jerusalem Targum is nearer to that of the Mishna, and the later Targum may be said to hold the same relation to it, both in respect of language and Haggadic matter, in which the Gemara stands to the Mishna. The Jerusalem Targum first saw the light in print, A.D. 1518, in the Bomberg Bible; it was also published in the London Polyglott, vol. iv. The Pseudo-Jonathan Targum was first printed, with Onkelos, Jerusalem Targum, and Rashi's Commentary, at Venice A.D. 1590, 1594; also in the London Polyglott, vol. iv. For critical information on these Targums Petermann should be consulted, as also Winer and Seligsohn.

The Talmud speaks of several Chaldee versions of the Hagiographa. Those that still exist may be divided into [1] the Targum on Psalms, Proverbs, and Job, falsely ascribed to Joseph the one-eyed [Zunz, 65], head of the school at Sora [A.D. 322]; [2] the five Megilloth—Song of Solomon, Ruth, Esther, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes; [3] Daniel, Chronicles, and Ezra, though the sacred books that contain an admixture of Chaldee were not usually handled by the Targumist, lest portions that were written in Chaldee should be mistaken for the authoritative Hebrew text.

[1] Internal evidence shews that the Targums on these three books were written by the same hand [Hävernick]. Zunz limits this identity to time and country. That on the Psalms, which is slightly polemical, shews signs of a Syriac text: it speaks of Constantinople [cviii. 11], and terms angels "angeli," as does that of Job [x. 5, 15, xx. 27, xxxv. 10; Zunz, 64]. Both the books of Psalms and of Job are treated in a free paraphrastic manner, and are full of Talmudic stories. The former borrows occasionally from the Targums of Pseudo-Jonathan and of Jerusalem, and betrays a chequered origin by its frequent indications of א"ת. The Targum on Proverbs is close and free from Haggadic trash. Its general agreement with a Syriac original is remarkable. Hävernick [see also Eichhorn, Einl. ii. 106; and Berthold, Einl. ii. 600] accounts for this from the close word-for-word style of either translation, and from the philological analogy between the two dialects. Dathe's supposition, however, that the paraphrast was indebted to the Syriac for aid, is probably correct [De Consens. vers. Chald. et. Syr. Prov. Salom.]. The points of Syriac analogy involve divergence from the Masoretic text, paraphrastic peculiarities, additions, and "variæ lectiones." Instances by way of explanation may be seen in Dr. Volck's article in Herzog, Thargumim.

[1] Compare Targ. on Isa. xii. 3, xxxiii. 22, lii. 7, lxii. 10; Jer. x. 11, where the Chaldee text also is paraphrased, xii. 5; Ezek. xi. 16, xvi.; Hos. iii. 2; Amos viii. 5; Mic. vi. 4; Hab. iii.; Zech. xii. 11.

Class [2] exhibits Targums that are more than paraphrases, and use rather the freer handling of the Midrash. They are written in a dialect that stands midway between the Eastern and Western Aramaic, such possibly as was used at an earlier date by the Jews of Antioch. They contain the same marks of a low date as the Targum of Pseudo-Jonathan, and are equally profuse in later Haggadic illustration. The Targum on the Song of Solomon anachronizes disgracefully, and is throughout an uninteresting glorification of Judaism. Esther has always been a favourite book with later Jews, though earlier Rabbinism admitted it with difficulty into the canon of Scripture. Hence its MSS. and Targums abound. Of these the Targum found in the Antwerp Polyglott is close and concise. A second and third were published by Tailer, London, A.D. 1655, the former of which [T. prius] was printed in the London Polyglott, the latter [T. posterius] runs more to legend.

[3] The Cambridge Cod. Erpenius contains a Targum on Chronicles, the existence of which was long unknown even to the Jews. Two other MSS. of it exist at Erfurt and at Dresden. Its date ranks later than the Jerusalem Targum, of which it makes use, though both may have drawn their materials from some "tertium quid."

ΤΕΛΕΙΟΙ, Perfecti. A name given in the early Church to communicants, those who had gone on to perfection through the stages of catechizing, baptism, and confirmation, and had now arrived at the climax of Christian grace, the reception of τὸ τέλειον, the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist. The term seems to have been in use in St. Paul's time, who writes ἐπὶ τὴν τελειότητα φερώμεθα [Heb. vi. 1], and Σοφίαν δὲ λαλοῦμεν ἐν τοῖς τελείοις [1 Cor. ii. 6]; and the latter words seem to shew that the full disclosure of Christian doctrine was made only to the baptized even in the time of the Apostles. [Disciplina Arcani.]

ΤΕΛΕΙΟΝ. A name for the Holy Eucharist, explained by the preceding article.

TEMPTATION, Πεῖρα. Trial and temptation have the same meaning, "trial" being Anglo-Saxon, and "temptation" derived from the Latin "tentatio." The distinction made between them, by using one for the trial and increase of faith, patience and strength, and the other for seductions to evil, is of modern growth, and therefore we find that in the Authorized Version of the Bible the words temptation and trial are used indiscriminately, sometimes with reference to the afflictions with which God visits men, and at others for persuasions to sin which Satan is at hand to suggest. There are five kinds of temptation, of which some are of the former and others of the latter kind; [1] Those whereby one man tempts another; [2] Those whereby men tempt themselves; [3] Those whereby men tempt God; [4] Those whereby God tempts men; [5] Those whereby Satan tempts men.

I. Temptations whereby one man tempts another. The intention of these may be to discover excellencies, as when the Queen of Sheba came to prove Solomon (ἦλθε πειράσαι) with hard questions [2 Chron. ix. 1]; or to find out men's hypocrisy, as when the Church of Ephesus is commended for having tried (ἐπείρασας) those who say that they are apostles and are not [Rev. ii. 2]; or else to discover some ground of accusation, as when the Jews tempted our Lord [Luke xx. 23].

II. Temptations whereby men tempt themselves. This, in the way of self-examination, is commended by St. Paul; "Examine yourselves" (ἑαυτοὺς πειράζετε) "whether ye be in the faith" [2 Cor. xiii. 5]; but a man may tempt himself sinfully when he presumptuously places himself in the way of temptation, or when he is drawn aside (πειράζεται) by his own lusts and enticed [Jas. i. 14].

III. Temptations whereby men tempt God. The Children of Israel are often said to have tempted God in the wildnerness when by their rebellion they tried His patience and provoked His wrath [Exod. xii. 2; Numb. x. 22; Mal. iii. 15; Acts xv. 10]. The tempting of God may be a presumptuous trying of God's Providence, as when the Devil tempted our Lord to cast Himself from the pinnacle of the Temple, and He answered, "It is written, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God;" or it may be the presuming on His forbearance, whereby men provoke Him to wrath. [Wrath of God.]

IV. Temptations whereby God assays men. God tempted Abraham to prove his obedience [Gen. xx. 1]. He tempted Hezekiah when He left him to himself to try him, that He might know all that was in his heart [2 Chron. xxxii. 31]. Dean Stanley, in suggesting that Satan may have tempted Abraham to offer up Isaac, says, "That the temptation or trial, through whatever means it was suggested, should in the sacred narrative be ascribed to the overruling voice of God, is in exact accordance with the general tenor of the Hebrew Scriptures. A still more striking instance appears to be contained in the history of David, where the same temptation which in one book is ascribed to God is in another ascribed to Satan; "The anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and He moved David to say, Go, number Israel" [2 Sam. xxiv. 1]: "Satan provoked David to number Israel" [1 Chron. xxi. 1]. But for the pronoun "he" in 2 Sam. xxiv. 1, the margin substitutes "Satan," and such an omission or ellipsis is strictly in accordance with the Hebrew idiom, which frequently omits the subject or noun when it can be plainly understood from the context [Malan, Philosophy or Truth, p. 159; Bishop Patrick, in loco]. Dean Stanley asserts that God would have tempted David to sin, but this assertion is directly contradictory to the words of St. James, "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither temptcth He any man" [Jas. i. 13]. The temptations which we receive from God are not temptations to sin, but trials and afflictions which are sent "to try our patience for the example of others, and that our faith may be found in the day of the Lord laudable, glorious, and honourable, to the increase of glory and endless felicity; or else to correct and amend in us whatsoever doth offend the eyes of our Heavenly Father" [Office for the Visitation of the Sick.] The temptations to which our Saviour alluded when He said to His disciples, "Ye are they that have continued with Me in my temptations" [Luke xxii. 28], were not the temptations of the Devil which He endured alone in the wilderness, but the sorrows and trials which He experienced from the contradiction of sinners and the want of faith of His disciples. It was in the endurance of these afflictions, as well as in the temptations with which the Devil assailed Him, that He learned His perfect sympathy with men, "for in that He Himself hath suffered, being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted" [Heb. ii. 18]. And these trials are truly called temptations, for they try what manner of spirit we are of; for the same afflictions which, when meekly borne, exalt and purify the soul, harden yet more the hearts of those who murmur and repine beneath God's chastening hand.

V. Temptations whereby the Devil tempts men. This is the Devil's chosen work. He is the Tempter, ὁ πειράζων [1 Thess. iii. 5]. He tempts us either by inflaming the evil lusts which lurk within us, or else by the positive suggestion of sin. In the cases of Adam and our Lord the temptations of the Devil were of the latter kind, because there were no sinful lusts in Adam before the Fall, and our Lord, though made like unto us in all things else, was without the stain of sin. Therefore, when the Devil came to Christ, he had nothing in Him [John xiv. 30]. Temptation is the common lot of man, and it is so by the permission of God. The temptation of Job throws some light upon this mysterious subject. Satan could not touch Job until he had obtained the permission of God, and this appears to have been given that Job's uprightness and submission might rebuke the pride of the evil one. The circumstances recorded in the first chapter of Job might be transferred to the history of Adam, and might help to explain how Satan obtained permission to enter the garden of Eden and seduce our first parents to sin. Temptation was a part of the probation in which they failed, and henceforth it became a part of that probation to which every child of Adam is made subject. The life of the Second Adam was in all its particulars a reversal of that of the first. As sin and death came by the first Adam so righteousness and life came by the second. The first was tempted and fell: the second was tempted and conquered. There was a similarity also in the temptation. The lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life were in each case appealed to. In the case of Adam, the fruit was good for food, pleasant to the eyes, and to be desired to make one wise. The desire of food, the pomp and splendour of the kingdoms of the world, and the renown which any one would have gained if he had cast himself unhurt from a pinnacle of the Temple, were the motives used by Satan in the successive temptations with which he assailed our Lord, but Christ obtained as complete a victory over Satan as Satan had done over Adam and Eve.

The question still remains, Why, if Satan was overcome, should he still be permitted to tempt the people of Christ? The reason is obvious, that, as they are called to follow their Master in all things else, so also in the combat with temptation, that they may share not only the toils of warfare, but the glories of victory; but they who would be conquerors must be so through Christ Who helpeth them. When He encountered the Devil, He did so as Incarnate God, but the strength with which He resisted is imparted to His people, who are made partakers of His nature. Therefore, to those who fear temptation, the promise "My grace is sufficient for thee" [2 Cor. xii. 9] points to the source from whence strength may be obtained. In the Lord's Prayer we are taught to pray, "Lead us not into temptation." In this petition we acknowledge God's supreme power and providence, which sets bounds even to the malice of the Devil. We pray [1] that we may not be placed in circumstances in which the trial might be beyond our strength. The martyrs prayed not for martyrdom, lest their strength should fail them in the hour of trial, but when it came they rejoiced that they were counted worthy of so glorious a crown. We pray [2] that instead of running into danger, God will remove from us the occasions of sin. [3] That God's grace may preserve us from those sins by which we might try His patience and provoke His displeasure. [4] That we may be delivered from those afflictions with which God visits us: although at the same time we must be prepared to submit to His will, after the example of our Master, Who, when in Gethsemane, He prayed that the cup might pass from Him, added "nevertheless not My will, but Thine be done." "Wishing, not struggling to be free," we may yet "count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations, knowing this, that the trying of our faith worketh patience" [Jas. i. 3; Rom. v. 3]. Lastly [5], we pray that if God should permit Satan to tempt us, He will furnish us with strength by which we shall be able to resist, and that with the temptation He will make a way of escape that we may be able to bear it [1 Cor. x. 13]. Humility prompts the prayer, although temptation must not be regarded as evil, since it is the appointed probation by which we may prove our strength and courage. "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him" [Jas. i. 12].

TER SANCTUS. The Triumphal Hymn[1] of the ancient Liturgies, "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Hosts, heaven and earth are full of Thy glory," &c.

The first revelation of this "song of the angels" is in Isaiah vi. 3, and it is repeated in Rev. iv. 8. It is an anthem constantly sung by the Church at her most solemn service, there being no really ancient liturgy in which she did not "with angels and archangels, and with all the company of heaven," thus offer praise.

"The footsteps of the Ter Sanctus, to say the least, are found in the old prayers of the Jews" [Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. i. 229]. In the "Service of the Sabbath Eve," "the congregation rise upon tiptoe three times, and repeat the words, 'Holy, Holy, Holy, is the Lord of Hosts, the earth is full of His glory.'"

In all ancient liturgies the Ter Sanctus comes near, but before, the prayer of consecration, and is sung by the choir and people. "The pontiff who is to celebrate approaches the altar, and praises the works of God, and, giving thanks for all, associates himself with the angels, and vociferates with them the triumphal hymn, the Holy, Holy, Holy: and the people also recite it, typifying the equality of peace which we shall hereafter enjoy with the angels, and our union with them" [Comm. of Symeon of Thessalonica on the Lit. of St. Chrys. Neale's transl. p. xxix.].

The Ter Sanctus formerly concluded with the words, "Hosanna in the highest, blessed is He that cometh in the Name of the Lord, Hosanna in the highest." This is the case in the Liturgies of St. James, St. Chrysostom, St. Basil, the Malabar, Mozarabic, and Sarum. In that of St. Clement the Sanctus and Hosanna are separate, and the Mozarabic has the further addition, "Hagios, hagios, hagios, Kyrie o Theos."

Out of a multitude of authorities for the use of this anthem it may be sufficient to cite St. Cyril of Jerusalem [Catech. Mystag. v. c. vi.]; St. Chrysostom [Hom. in Seraphim and Hom. in Iesa.]. It is mentioned also by St. Gregory Nyssen, Origen, Tertullian, and others. The Council of Vaison [A.D. 529] ordered, "Ut in omnibus missis, sive matutinis, sive quadragesimalibus, vel quæ in defunctorum commemorationibus fiunt, semper Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus, eo ordine quo ad missas publicas, dici debeat, quia tam dulcis et desiderabilis vox, etiamsi diu noctuque posset dici, fastidium non potest generare" [Martene, De Antiq. Eccl. Rit. vii. 394].

The "Prefaces" of the Ter Sanctus are very various, being adapted to different festivals and seasons. But they invariably end with the doxological form represented by the "Therefore with angels and archangels," &c. of the Prayer Book. In all liturgies the Preface is sung or said by the celebrant alone, the choir and people joining in at the hymn itself. Hence, in the Sarum Missal, followed by the Prayer Books of 1549 and 1552, the Sanctus is printed as a separate paragraph.

TESTAMENT, NEW. St. Paul's expression, ἡ παλαιὰ διαθήκη [2 Cor. iii. 14], descriptive of the Books of the Old Covenant, naturally led to the expression ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη to describe the Books of the New. The New Testament is so called by Origen [De Princip. iv. 1], as it is styled "Novum Testamentum" by Tertullian [Adv. Marc. iv. 1]. For this use of the Latin word testamentum, see art. on OLD TESTAMENT.

Following a division apparently first employed by Marcion of Pontus [see art. on CANON], the Books of the New Testament were parted into two classes, τὸ Εὐαγγέλιον (or Εὐαγγελικόν), and ὁ Ἀπόστολος (or Ἀποστολικόν)—"The Gospel" and "The Apostle." "The Gospel" was the collection consisting of our four Gospels; for, originally, the term Gospel signified the summary of all Christian doctrine [e.g. Gal. i. 6, 7], no one of the Books proceeding from the four Evangelists representing that doctrine in all its completeness, each containing something peculiar whereby the other three were supplemented. Consequently, these Books were not originally styled absolutely Gospels; St. Justin Martyr, e.g., naming them ἀπομνημονεύματα τῶν Ἀποστόλων, just as we say "Xenophon's Memoirs of Socrates." Subsequently, the titles "The Gospel according to (κατά) Matthew," or Mark, &c. (i.e. so far as each of the four Evangelists imparted the one Gospel) became usual; but the perfect summary was called τὸ Εὐαγγέλιον.

"The Apostle," comprising the Apocalypse and the Book of the Acts, was made up of the remaining historical, didactic, and prophetical Books. Somewhat later, the Epistles were divided into the Pauline and the Catholic: 1 St. Peter and 1 St. John being at first reckoned with the Pauline collection, but, since the fourth century, belonging to the collection designated "the Catholic Epistles" (ἐπιστολαὶ καθολικαί). The later ecclesiastical writers[2] explain this title as if it were simply equivalent to ἐπιστολαὶ ἐγκύκλιοι, implying that these Epistles were addressed not to particular communities, but to the Church at large. This, however, does not suit 2 and 3 St. John, although, no doubt, something to this effect was what was intended. One can scarcely accept the explanation of Hug,[1] that by the "Catholic Epistles" we are to understand merely that collection which comprised the didactic writings of all the Apostles except St. Paul.

[1] See the striking words of the Lit. of St. James: τὸν ἐπινίκιον ὕμνον τῆς μεγαλοπρεποῦς σου δόξης λαμπρᾷ τῇ φωνῇ ᾄδοντα, βοῶντα, δοξολογοῦντα, κεκραγότα, καὶ λέγοντα. So in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, and others.

[2] E.g., Œcumenius, Prolegg. in Ep. Jac.; Leontius, De Sectis, c. 2.

For the distinction between the parts of the New Testament termed ὁμολογούμενα ("universally acknowledged"), and ἀντιλεγόμενα ("spoken against"—i.e. by some), as also for the terms proto- and deutero-canonical, see the article on the CANON.

TESTAMENT, OLD. In 2 Kings xxiii. 21 we meet the expression ספר הברית, "the Book of the Covenant" (viz. between Jehovah and His people), which is rendered in LXX. βίβλος τῆς διαθήκης [cf. 1 Macc. i. 57]. In 2 Cor. iii. 14, where Exod. xxxiv. 29 is referred to, we meet the expression ἡ παλαιὰ διαθήκη. Hence, accepting one of the meanings of διαθήκη (a will or a covenant) we find Tertullian using the phrase, "Vetus Testamentum."[2] He also refers to the "Vetus instrumentum," and "Evangelicum instrumentum,"—i.e. document or public writing. Lactantius[3] offers an explanation of the term Testamentum thus used, resting on the ambiguity by which some expound Heb. ix. 16. A will, or testament, he argues, first becomes known and receives its value after the testator's death; so, through the death of Christ, the mysteries of the Old Testament, for the first time, became intelligible, and were perfectly fulfilled.

The Old Testament is that collection of Books received as sacred and inspired by the ancient Jewish Church, and, on this testimony, accepted as such by the Christian Church; for, as the Apostle writes [Rom. iii. 2], to the Jews "were committed the oracles of God." According to an ancient classification these Books were divided into "the Law, the Prophets, and [other sacred] Writings"—תורה, נביאים, כתובים. We read of "the Law" in John xii. 34; of[4] "the Law and the Prophets" in Acts xxviii. 23; of "the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms," in Luke xxiv. 44, where our Lord is the speaker. The earliest notice of this classification is to be found in the Prologue to the Book of Ecclesiasticus, where we read τοῦ νόμου, καὶ τῶν προφητῶν, καὶ τῶν ἄλλων. In this last class—entitled in Hebrew Kethubim, in Greek Hagiographa,[5] the Psalms, as being placed first, stand for the whole.[6] This class comprises the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. "The Law" consists of the five Books of Moses. "The Prophets" include the remaining Books. Of this classification no satisfactory reason has ever been given: it is not noticed by Josephus, and the knowledge of the reasons which led to it seems to have been lost at a very early period. The common notion, borrowed from the Jewish Rabbins of the Middle Ages, viz., that the different "degrees of inspiration" under which the various Books were imagined to have been composed caused this distinction,—has been shewn, with great probability, by Hävernick,[7] to have been borrowed from Mohammedan sources. [CANON.]

THEANDRIC OPERATION [θεανδρικὴ ἐνέργεια]. A theological term first used in the seventh century, and intended to express that unity of operation in the two natures and the two wills of our Lord Jesus Christ by which they act as the natures and wills of one indivisible Person, God and Man. It was called a novel term by the Council of Lateran [A.D. 649], and discouraged as such in its fifteenth canon, which speaks of the "heretics" who had introduced it (τὴν ἐπ' αὐτῇ θεανδρικῇ καινὴν ῥῆσιν): which makes it seem likely that it had been used by some of the Monothelite sect in justification of their principles. St. John Damascene [De Orthod. Fide, lxvi.] thus explains the term: "The theandric operation then signifies this; that when God became Man, both His human operation was Divine, that is, deified, and not void of participation in His Divine operation; and His Divine operation was not void of participation in His Human operation, but either is contemplated in connection with the other. And this manner is styled 'periphrasis,' when a person embraces any two things by one expression. For as we call the divided cauterizing and the inflamed incision of a heated knife the same thing, but call the incision one operation and the cauterizing another, calling them operations of different natures, the cauterizing of fire and the incision of iron; so also, speaking of one theandric operation of Christ, we understand the operations of the two Natures to be two, the Divine that of His Divinity, and the Human that of His Humanity." [COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM.]

THEISM. Theism is a term of religious philosophy rather than of theology. It was first used by Kant to designate thinkers who, rejecting the notion of revelation, allow the controlling action of Providence, and believe that the Deity, having a personal existence, stands in a closer connection with us than the "Deus melior de tranquillitate" [Tertullian] of the Gnostic and of the Stoic. Theism then may be defined as speculative theology. It issues from the positive pole of speculative thought, as Deism, Pantheism, and Atheism, determine the current from the negative pole—all stand in voltaic connection in the laminated pile of infidelity. There is some degree of life in the reasonings of the former, there is the coldness of death in the latter group; for Theism at least teaches in the positive way that "God is," and that He upholds all things in the moral as in the physical world by the word of His power. It inculcates a sense of responsibility to a personal God, and on this foundation the superstructure of revealed religion may be carried up. It is the converse therefore of atheism. The definition of Theism is best given in the terms of its principal

[1] Einleitung, ii. sec. 603.
[2] Adv. Marc. iv. 1, 2; cf. St. August. De Civ. Dei, xx. 4.
[3] Inst. iv. 20.
[4] Cf. Joseph, De Maccab. 18.
[5] Ἁγιόγραφα and γραφεῖα—see St. Epiphan. Hæres. xxix. 7; De Pond. et Mensur. 4.
[6] Cf. 2 Macc. ii. 13, καὶ τὰ τοῦ Δαυίδ.
[7] Einleitung, Th. i. Abth. i. sec. 66.

hierophant, J. H. Fichte, editor of the Zeitschrift für Philosophie und Philosophische Kritik [Halle, 1856, xxix. 229, and not to be confused with the philosopher of the same name]. He terms the Deity the Absolute Creator Spirit (Welt princip), which, he says, is no blind unconscious power neither falling under the category of an universal substance, nor of an abstract impersonal reason; but its correct idea is that of a Being existing of and for itself, absolute self-consciousness; that the cosmic harmony is as little dependent on accident and blind chance as on necessity, and that the marks of design which it contains shew that the prescribed order is highly developed and perfected according to the idea of the Good and Beautiful; that an empirical examination of the isolated facts of nature, by a wide induction, leads the metaphysical inquirer on to the sure idea of an absolute designing cause of all, whose properties thus read on the face of creation can only be termed Perfect Thought and a Will for Good. Now, assuming with Descartes that the idea of God is innate in the soul of man, what are the arguments, à priori and à posteriori, that shew such assumption to be reasonable, and at the same time demonstrate the distinct personality of the Deity? for to profess belief in a God, and to deny His personal existence, is a virtual denial of His existence at all, otherwise than in a pantheistic sense, or as the mundane soul of the Stoic. Placing ourselves for the present in the Theist's point of view, and applying the principles of his theodicy, or rational theology, it is proposed [1] to examine the various ontological proofs of the Divine existence by the à priori method; [2] to give brief but sufficient instances of the method à posteriori; a subject that can only just be touched, where every blade of grass might supply its contingent; and [3] to indicate the more recent phases of Theism as emanating from Hegelianism.

I. No à priori argument thoroughly satisfies the reason. Hence the method was coldly regarded by the severe dialecticians of the Schools. This shews the absolute necessity for revealed truth, and in tanto it is an argument for the antecedent probability of a revelation. The principal arguments à priori are those connected with the systems of Plato and Aristotle, with Anselm in the scholastic period, and with Descartes at the dawn of modern philosophy.

The argument "de contingentia mundi," suggested by Plato [De Leg. x.] and developed by Aristotle [Phys. vii. 8; Metaphys. xii. 7], establishes a first cause of all from the unbroken sequence of secondary causes that are in operation around us. Thus Aristotle instances the phenomenon of motion; and since all motion involves the idea of moving power, we get back ultimately to the motionless mover, κινοῦν ἀκινητόν, who is the originator of every other impulse, that is, to the idea of God. And the same reasoning holds good if we substitute any other series, whether of secondary causes or derived substance. But the impossibility of a perpetual chain is assumed, and the reasoning is philosophically defective.

A more satisfactory proof is that which Plato has founded on his universal and necessary ideas; which Augustine transmitted to Anselm and Malebranche, and which Bossuet and Fenelon have commended to Catholic acceptance in modern times. The true object of science, according to Plato, was not the pursuit of fleeting matters of interest and speculation, but of those eternal and necessary ideas that the thinking mind is able to assimilate to itself, the ideas of the beautiful and just, the true and good; they are links whereby man becomes united with the eternal source of all goodness and truth. This method has met with general acceptance; its simple truth commending itself to the conscience of all who have found points of weakness in every other phase of the argument à priori.[1]

Anselm in his Proslogium gives his famous metaphysical demonstration of the Divine existence in the following terms, faith however in the Deity being presupposed:—"I believe, O Lord, that Thou art such as that it is impossible to imagine a greater than Thou. Can such a nature cease to exist because 'the fool hath said in his heart there is no God?' But of a truth the fool himself when he hears these words, a Being than whom nothing can be conceived that is greater, the fool comprehends that which he hears: and that which he hears is in his intellect, even though he comprehends not that the Being of whom I speak to him has existence. For it is one thing to have an idea in the mind and another thing to conceive that it exists. Thus, when a painter meditates upon a subject that he is about to work out, he has in his intellect the idea of his work, knowing that the work is not really achieved; but when the picture is completed the painter at once conceives the idea of it and knows that it is really accomplished. The fool then is convicted of having in his thought, at least, that Being than whom nothing greater can be conceived; since he comprehends these words when they are uttered, and that which he comprehends is in his intellect. But it is impossible that the Being which is greater than anything that can be conceived should exist only in the intellect. For if it existed only in the intellect, one might think of this same Being as existing at one and the same time in the intellect and in reality, which is more than mere existence in the intellect. If, therefore, the Being than which nothing can be conceived that is greater, exists only in the intellect, it follows that the being than whom nothing can be conceived that is greater is also the being than whom a greater is conceived, which is impossible. We may conclude, then, beyond all doubt that the Being than whom nothing greater can be conceived exists at the same time in the intellect and in reality."[2] "Et hoc es Tu, Domine." Further, he adds this other proof: "It is impossible to conceive that God does not exist, for by definition God is a being such as no greater can be conceived. But I can conceive a being such as that it shall be impossible to think that it is non-existent, and that being is evidently superior to one whose non-existence is conceivable. Therefore, if it be conceded that it is possible to think that God does not exist, there would be a being greater than God, that is, a being greater than the being than whom no greater can be conceived, which is absurd." Next, God being everything that is most excellent, His attributes are methodically worked out by Anselm with an unction that combines the fervour of the mystic with the exactness of the dialectician. This argument, which however should be taken in connection with the principles worked out in the Monologium from Augustine, has ever since been a fruitful subject for discussion. It was at once attacked by Gaunilon, a monk of Marmoutier (Martini Monasterium), as spokesman for "the fool;" not that he adopted "the fool's" theory, but as being unable to resist the temptation of breaking a lance with the Archbishop of Canterbury. To the realism of Anselm he opposes the empirical spirit of conceptualism, and makes experience the sole basis of knowledge; his is altogether the sensualistic argument.[1] The Schoolmen in general rejected Anselm's reasoning, including Thomas Aquinas and Gerson, who treated it as a paralogism, "en quoi ils ont eu grand tort," as Leibnitz said.[2] At the dawn of modern philosophy, Descartes, who was no reader of books and had a considerable contempt for the lights of the dark ages, stumbled upon the same argument, having received it, as Leibnitz supposes, from the Jesuit College of La Flèche, where he was a student in his early years.[3] Descartes reasons as follows: "I am a creature full of imperfection; yet from the bosom of this imperfection I rise, by the energy of thought and heart, to the idea of a supreme perfection, possessing every attribute of excellence of which I perceive faint traces in my own being and in others around me. Whence comes to me this sublime conception? It cannot originate in my own weakness, neither can I discover it in the world of which I form a part. It must come, therefore, from the All-perfect, Who has stamped it on my being, as the artificer sets his trade-mark on the work of his intelligence."[4] This argument was no sooner broached than it met with the same opposition as did Anselm's in the tenth century; and from such close reasoners as Hobbes, Huet, and Gassendi. Descartes answered very much as Anselm replied to Gaunilon, that the idea of perfection must involve the idea of existence; it is not human thought that creates any matter of external necessity, but the necessary existence of that which is external to it impresses itself upon the thought. The idea of infinity could never be gained by a finite being unless an infinite being had vouchsafed it. It is not the philosopher who works himself into the light that is denied to the rest of his race, but the same light is vouchsafed to all; the idea of God is innate in man, and à priori reasoning only lays bare that which of necessity is. Hence, as an infinite series of second causes ascends to the notion of one first cause, and as the various finite gradations of beauty and fitness imply one source of all harmony, so the conception of the infinitely perfect is the symbol and guarantee of the real existence of infinite perfection. The cause of a necessary idea must have as real an existence as its effect. Descartes has condensed his reasoning into the following syllogism: "To affirm that any attribute is contained in the nature or conception of a thing, is to affirm that such attribute is true of the thing, and that it is surely contained in it; but necessary existence is contained in the nature and conception of the Deity, therefore necessary existence is a true attribute of the Deity, or God of necessity exists" [Rep. aux Sec. Obj.]. The metaphysical argument of Anselm, thus endorsed by Descartes, was accepted by Malebranche, Bossuet, Fenelon, and Leibnitz, the latter having added the proof that possible and actual existence in the Deity are identical, the weak link in the Anselmo-Cartesian reasoning. It was then subjected to a crucial critique by Kant, who, however he may have disposed of the syllogism of the Schoolmen, was unable to shake the ground of reason on which it was built up.[5] Both Anselm and Descartes only spoke as Plato had spoken before. But where Kant has condemned as inconsequent, Hegel has interposed a plea in arrest of judgment; for a system that seemed to identify subject, object, thought, and being, was welcomed by him as an ally. Down to the present day, therefore, from the tenth century, the reasoning of Anselm, borrowed in its essence from Augustine, has exerted its influence on the profoundest thinkers of the human race. But it is impossible to deny that it has encouraged pantheistical reasoning; even Fenelon is not wholly free from the taint. Kant thus sets out the argument that he undertakes to refute, and which was first termed by him ontological: "I can form the notion of an All-perfect Being; but existence is a perfection; therefore I must attribute existence to this Being." Here, he says, the idea of existence is arbitrarily interposed, and the added idea of existence is no development of the original notion; it may cover integrally the subject and all its predicates, but it is in itself no predicate. The idea of a hundred crowns that I have, is identical with that of a hundred crowns that I have not. Further, if in accordance with the principles of Leibnitz, and to reduce the syllogism to more perfect order, it be modified by saying

[1] See Bossuet, Traité de l'Existence de Dieu et de soi-même, iv. 5, 6, 7; Fenelon, Traité de l'Existence de Dieu, I. iv. 3.

[2] Proslogium, seu Alloquium de Dei Natura. Fides quæres intellectum, c. 2, 3, 4.

[1] Gaunilon, Liber pro Insipiente. For further information on this controversy the reader is referred to Bouchitte's work on the metaphysical argument of Anselm; Hauréau, H. de la Scholastique, I. viii.; Saisset, De Varia S. Anselmi in Proslogio Argumenti Fortuna; Franck, Anselm Dargestellt; Billroth, De Anselmi Proslog. et Monolog. Diss. II. Crit.; and compare Thom. Aq. Summ. Theol. I. qu. 2, a. 1.

[2] Nouv. Ess. sur l'Entendm. Hum. IV. x. 7.

[3] Ibid. Bayle, however, considers that Descartes had a deeper knowledge of scholastic philosophy than he cared to avow.

[4] Medit. iii.

[5] Compare Cousin, Leçons sur Kant, p. 250; and see Fenelon, Traité de l'Existence de Dieu, II. ii.

that the Divine existence is possible, and therefore of necessity, possibility with Leibnitz involving the inevitable reason of a thing, the syllogism would run thus: "Everything in which essence and existence are inseparable have a necessary being, but in God essence and existence are inseparable; therefore God has a necessary being." Here the necessity, Kant says, is of our own devising, and does not involve the necessary reality of that of which it is here affirmed. If God be Almighty, the predicate is inseparable from the subject; but what compels us to affirm either? It is thus that the metaphysical argument of Anselm is said by one set of disputants to involve a "petitio principii," while by others it is upheld as the quintessence of subtle reasoning. But the notion of supreme existence is of neeessary consequence, according to the reasoning of the Monologium. The argument of the Proslogion is based on that deduction, and the conception of the Deity becomes no arbitrary fiction of the intellect with Anselm, but a necessary result of reason. The à priori essence of the argument consists in proving the Divine subjective existence,[1] antecedently to the objective proofs of His being in creation, and not in first imbuing the mind, prior to all notion of a Deity, with the verity of the Divine existence. As regards the Cartesian view, the idea of the Deity is marked on the soul in characters that are indelible, and that in no respect originate in any faculty of the mind.

Hegel, it has already been observed, could altogether assent to the ontological proof; for though it did not go the length of fusing together thought and being, it was by no means inconsistent with his method. Kant's illustration, he said,[2] of the hundred crowns seems to be telling, but it is only so in appearance; it is the property of the finite to have its being separate from its idea; the Infinite can only be eonceived as existent, and conception of the notion of the Infinite is a true reflex of its being.[3] Schelling also claimed a kindred view of thought in Anselm, as having first indicated dimly the identity of thought and being; Descartes favoured the same view in his "Cogito, ergo sum," and in his argument for the Divine existence from the fact of its notion being conceived by the thinking mind. The ontological argument that Kant found faulty, though not altogether on sufficient grounds, was fully allowed by Hegel and Schelling, who, whatever may have been the tendency of their respective systems, were at least eonsistent reasoners. In other respeets there is the widest possible gulf between the reasoning of Anselm and the Hegelian theory of universal identity, which means pantheism.

A different order of à priori proof is connected with the names of Sir I. Newton and Dr. Samuel Clarke. Newton first indicated it as so much assertion rather than proof, Clarke reduced it into methodical argument. The words of Newton are, "Deus æternus est et infinitus, omnipotens et omnisciens; id est, durat ab æterno in æternum et adest ab infinito in infinitum; omnia regit et cognoscit quæ fiunt aut fieri possunt. Non est æternitas vel infinitas; non est duratio et spatium, sed durat et adest. Durat semper et adest ubique, et existendo semper et ubique, durationem et spatium, æternitatem et infinitatem constituit" [Princ. Schol. gen. fin. vers.]. Clarke argues here that we can conceive space without limit, a time without beginning or end. Neither space or time of whatever degree are substances, they are accidental properties and attributes; but properties and attributes must have their concrete subject, and that subject, as regards time and space, is God.[4] But Leibnitz did not fail to observe that time and space are in no sense to be regarded as attributes of the Divine Being; for remove the idea of both, and the idea of God still remains where it was. Space has parts, then if it be a property of the Deity, the Deity has parts. Time is a succession of changes. We never bathe twice in the same stream was a saying of Heraclitus, all is movement, all is flux. If time therefore be of the Divine Substance, it subjects it to change. The immenseness of the Deity fills all things, time and space included; how then can they be attributes of that substance that fills them? The immensity of God is independent of space, as the eternity of God is of time. But time and space are a finite reflex image of the Infinite. An impassable gulf separates them from their origin and cause. We can assign to them no limits, yet space, however extended, will never reach the immensity of Him who spread it out; time, however we multiply age upon age, will never sum eternity; yet the vastness of the one and the continued aggregation of the other, although they cannot give an independent testimony to the truth of the Divine existence, are considerations that, like everything else that is create, help out the proof.

II. As the idea of the Divine existence per se constitutes the ontological or metaphysical proof, so the knowledge of God derived from the works of creation is the physico-theological proof. The schools, from Thomas Aquinas onwards, discouraged the former method as generally unsuggestive and meagre for all whose minds have received no metaphysical training, whereas the rich vein of argument that rises to the mind under the latter method,[5] from the order of the world and the action of second and final causes, is in the highest degree convincing. It is therefore termed the argnment à posteriori, as being supplied by the induction of experience. The harmony of the works of creation is so manifestly the result of arrangement and contrivance and predetermination, the mutual adaptation of one part to the wants of another is so clearly marked, the

[1] "Ce n'est qu'un moyen de prouver l'existence de Dieu à priori par sa propre notion sans recourir à ses effets." [Leibnitz, Nouv. Ess. iv. 10.]

[2] Encycl. I. Log. p. i. a. 51, and Works, vi. 112.

[3] Schelling, Neue Zeitschrift für Spec. Physik, i. 38; Hegel, Encycl. i. 98.

[4] S. Clarke on the Existence and Attributes of God, c. 4; Leibnitz, ed. Jacques, ii. 414.

[5] Compare Aristot. Analyt. Post. II. ii.; Clem. Al. Strom. V. xii.

even tenor of nature's operations is so invariable, that it can only be through a most vicious condition of the intellect, an ἀπολίθωσις τοῦ νοητικοῦ, that educated man can fail to trace in them the hand of God. "Affirmo parum philosophiæ naturalis et in ea progressum liminarem ad atheismum opiniones inclinare; contra, multum philosophiæ naturalis, et in ea progressum penetrantem ad religionem animos circumferre."[1] The evidences of design are everywhere and in everything, and our perception of them is only limited by the limited scope of our faculties. Our senses without external aid can only convey sensations from the surface of things, and from immediate contiguity. But extend their range ever so little, and we find ourselves in a new world. An unlettered peasant would hear incredulously that vast mountain chains rise up from the lunar surface; that it is blistered by volcanic action; that it is studded over with cup-like hills which at some time poured forth their streams of liquid fire; but increase the powers of vision ever so little, for little enough is added by the most powerful telescope, and the doubter would see for himself a seamed surface—mountains that cast their shadows on the lunar plain, and craters that tell their own history, their serrated edges being projected as shadows on the opposite side. Generally, therefore, seeing our own imperfection, we must be content for the present to behold the scheme of Providence only as through a glass darkly; but dark and dim as the Divine ἴχνη may appear, we are certain that they are only relatively so by reason of our imperfection, not absolutely in themselves. It is sufficient for us to trace the sure working of design, so far as our faculties for observing reach, in order that we may infer the same design everywhere and in everything. We must be content only to know in part, but that partial knowledge is pregnant with safe induction; it is the gauge of our ignorance in matters that lie beyond.

What evidences of complicated design do our organs of sense present? The eye, for example, does not simply receive the impress of visible objects, as a mirror may receive the spectrum, but it exhibits so many points of adjustment to varying circumstances, as to be a signal proof of contriving wisdom; and "the more complex any constitution is, and the greater variety of parts there are which thus tend to some one end, the stronger is the proof that such end was designed" [Butler, Serm. ii. on H. Nat.]. The pencil of light that falls on the outer transparent coating of the eye contains an infinity of separate rays; and these after entering the iris pass through the crystalline lens, where each separate ray is bent or refracted to a definite direction; and by some mechanical adjustment not yet well understood, at the exact focal distance impinges upon the retina at the back of the eyeball. Each ray, therefore, having received its proper direction, the entire fasciculus is projected in order upon the network of nervous tissue, which conveys the sensation to the brain, giving an exact miniature representation of each object in the field of vision. Without this refraction of each individual ray they would all fall upon the retina in one confused mass of light; it is the refraction of each taken singly, and its consignment to one exact focal point, belonging to itself and itself only, that produces in the aggregate an accurate facsimile within of the great world without. Then the narrow space within which all this marvellous adjustment of infinite complexities takes place, marks the work of Him in whose estimate our relative ideas of small and great are equally nothing.

Rays of light that stream in from a field of vision embracing the half of a hemisphere, are depicted upon the space of less than a square inch at the back of the eye. Whatever proportion, therefore, any object on which we fix the eye bears to the whole field of vision, that same proportion does its image bear to the picture of the entire field projected upon the retina. As the apparent diameter of the moon, for instance, is to the entire portion of the sky that we can behold at once without moving the eyeball, so is the image of the moon upon the retina to the square inch representing that sensitive surface. If we descend to the smaller animals, the minuteness is proportionately increased. Now, by what chance can it have happened, not only that each animal should have been provided with an organ for converting the light of heaven into its chief source of comfort and happiness, but that the organ of vision itself should have been exactly adapted to its purpose by functions of such incredible delicacy? Then, again, the crystalline lens is no less wonderfully designed to obviate one of the greatest difficulties with which the practical optician has to contend, the production of an achromatic spectrum, tinged with no adventitious colour beyond its own. The rays of light being resoluble into the prismatic colours, and variously refrangible, on passing through a refracting medium, easily become sensible to the eye as coloured rays, unless indeed their unequal dispersion be met by some corrective process. The difficulty which the mechanic obviates in the peculiar composition and combination of the various lenses is fully met in the mechanism of the eye. The different humours of the eye partly subserve this purpose, but the corrective process in a far higher degree is perfected by the crystalline lens itself. It was evidently made for this diffractive property of light, for it is not homogeneous as the telescopic lens; its structure is laminated like a bulbous root, one coat overlaying the other, and these increase in density from without inwards, so that there is a considerable difference between the density of the first grumous gum-like layer without and the more solid nucleus within. It is the graduated density of these pellucid laminæ, and the variously diffractive character of the lens in consequence of this structure, which causes the rays of light to be passed through to the retina, subject to no other colouring than that of the object from whence they are reflected. Other instances of design may be instanced in the metallic brilliancy wherewith the inner coat of the eye is burnished in night-feeding animals as an aid to vision, and in the muscular apparatus of the eye, whether externally shifting the field of vision as required, by means of the various muscles and tendonous pulleys in connection with it, and giving the idea of relative distance, and consequently of magnitude, by means of the angle subtended by the object viewed; or internally regulating the amount of light thrown upon the sensitive retina by means of the ciliary muscles of the iris that are themselves affected by the action of light, and expand or contract the pupil in proportion to the degree of intensity of the rays. Every portion and contrivance of the organ of vision is so completely illustrative of creative design as to cause it to have been said, with no rhetorical hyperbole, "It is a machine of such exquisite and obvious adaptation to the effects produced by it, as to be of itself, in demonstrating the existence of the Divine Being who contrived it, equal in force to many volumes of theology. The atheist who has seen and studied its internal structure, and yet continues an atheist, may be fairly considered to be beyond the power of mere argument to reclaim."[1] [Brown, Phil. of Mind, Lect. 28.]

[1] Bacon, Med. Sacr., de Atheismo.

And if chance could never have assumed the semblance of design, neither could it uphold the world in the steady course which it has maintained ever since the day of its creation. It is this fully as much as the marks of design that are patent in the face of creation, that speaks to us of the existence of Him Who "upholdeth all things by the word of His power." Take but a few of those objects which are requisite for everyday life. A minute deviation from the one standard established by Him Who gave nature her laws would cause utter destruction. Cereal grain, man's chief subsistence, depends upon the starch which it contains for the continuance of its species, in supplying the requisite nourishment to the embryo plant. When the grain is sown, the starch in nature's laboratory becomes converted into sugar, the pabulum of the tender germ: for coincident with the first growth of the cotyledon is the formation of a small quantity of a white soluble substance from the gluten named diastase. It is by combination with this substance that starch, which is insoluble in water, and therefore unfit to form the sap of plants, becomes converted into dextrin, which is highly soluble. Mix common starch with water containing a little sulphuric acid, and a soluble gummy substance is the result, which is dextrin. This dextrin, or transmuted starch, is taken up by the sap into the plant, and acquiring from the sap an excess of water, or, chemically speaking, of oxygen and hydrogen in the definite proportion in which these elements exist in water, becomes converted by a further process into sugar, the taste of which is familiar in green wheat. Further, as the plant approaches maturity, this sugar through the agency of nitrogen becomes reconverted into starch in the ripened grain, which is in this way prepared again for the manifold increase of another year; while in the woody parts of the plant the sugar nitrogenized in a similar way takes the form of cellular fibre. It may be added that when once the vital action is aroused in the seed, and the process of the conversion of its starch into dextrin and sugar has commenced, if the vital energy be not supported continually, it wholly evaporates, and no art of man could quicken it again. Of this arrested vitality, and of the conversion of starch into sugar, malt is the familiar type. Now we may bear in mind that starch and the chemical developments of starch, dextrin and sugar, are only very slight modifications of the selfsame chemical elements. Starch and dextrin consist of carbon forty-eight by weight, and water sixty, while sugar differs from them only in containing a larger element of water, viz. sixty-six. Upon what a gossamer thread then does the staff of life seem to hang! Were it not for the first nitrogenized element of diastase, the embryo plant, though surrounded with its first food in the starch of the grain, could not assimilate it. Were it not for a further addition of oxygen and hydrogen, the saccharine matter so indispensable for the growth of the plant could not be formed, and the various vessels would be clogged with gum. So again, were it not for the presence of nitrogen, the sugar of the plant could not be converted into the starch of the ripened grain. Miscarriage at any of these points would be destruction to the individual, and if the defect were general the species would be annihilated. The quantitative analysis of the two kindred substances of sugar and starch given above will have shewn how easily the one type would glide into the other, if all depended upon chance, to the utter destruction of vegetable life. In the disease known as diabetes a vitiated modification of the proportional quantities of oxygen, hydrogen, and carbon in the urea, converts it into sugar, and death is the certain result.

The function of respiration supplies another instance of God's providental care for His creatures. The oxygen withdrawn from the air each time the lungs are filled is exactly an equivalent in bulk to the volume of carbonic acid gas evolved in the ensuing expiration; that is, it is returned charged with its chemical equivalent of carbon. Hence, when the atmosphere is permanently vitiated by animal respiration, the blood ceases to be properly decarbonized, and disease is the never-failing consequence of the crowded state of our large towns. In a besieged city as many fall from impure air as from hostile cartridges. How then does nature restore the tainted purity of the air? By the simple law that the vegetable creation should require for its nourishment the carbonic element of the breath emitted by animals. While the vegetable world appropriates the carbon, it evolves again from myriads of leaves the oxygen which is to enter into the animal economy through the lungs, and to return once more to the plant charged with its equivalent bulk of carbon. Further, since it requires bright sunshine to generate this gas by vegetable digestion, the rich vegetation of the tropics is a never-failing laboratory; and when emitted, the various currents of the atmosphere, and the known property of gaseous elements to diffuse themselves speedily and equally around, soon convey it to the destination indicated by animal demand. It is thus that a constant equilibrium is maintained between the antagonizing forces of nature, and the more carefully we consider such instances of design and mutual adaptation, the more shall we find it impossible to see the first cause of all these secondary and final causes anywhere but in God. As Paley has said, "After all the schemes and struggles of a reluctant philosophy, the necessary resort is to a Deity. The marks of design are too strong to be gotten over, and design must have a designer; that designer must have been a person; that person is God."

[1] Instances of the à posteriori argument, of varying interest and cogency, form the staple of the Bridgewater Treatises. Bell, The Hand; Buckland, Geology and Mineralogy; Chalmers and Kidd, Adaptation of External Nature to the Constitution of Man; Prout, Chemical Action; Roget, Animal and Vegetable Physiology; Whewell (instar omnium), Astronomy and General Physics.

It remains to be seen that there is a real connexion between modern Theism and the Pantheism of Hegel.

III. The definition of the Creator Spirit, or world principle, given by Fichte, that it exists "of and for itself," has a definite bearing on the Pantheism of Hegel, according to whom the Divine principle is self-existent, but unconscious, like the Demiurge of Gnosticism, it first gains self-consciousness in the works of creation, and in the knowledge that the human intellect acquires of its being. Thus German Theism adopts the general principles of the Hegelian theory, but variously modifies this monstrous contradiction of an unconscious Deity first gaining consciousness in the human intelligence with which it is identified; and the Theistical school only differs in its component elements, according to the closer or more remote resemblance in other respects to Hegelianism pure and simple. Throughout, the universe is represented as emanating from the real Being of God, as the self-objectuation, self-expression, self-intuition, and self-perfection of the Divine Essence. The cardinal point of difference with thorough Hegelianism is always the same, that the self-consciousness, and thence the Being of God in its subjective relation, exists "of and for itself," and does not depend on the world or on the presence of human intelligence. Its relation with Deism is rather more remote; which represents the Deity as the Absolute, and by virtue of its absolute power, wisdom, and goodness, the eternally perfect Spirit, existing in essential opposition with the conditioned, that has its being only in the progressional development of the mundane principle. Theism then stands midway between Deism and Pantheism. With the former it allows the existence of an absolutely self-conscious being; with the latter it derives every phase of the conditioned from the Absolute. For instance Schelling, in his philosophical treatises, satisfies the definition of Theism in describing the Deity as the Lord of Being, "existing of and for Himself;" but the world is considered by him as being developed concentrically as it were around the Deity, which is its mid-point of evolution and cosmic principle, and as such is all but identified with the mundane substance. He closely touches on the confines of Pantheism. Ch. H. Weisse, adopting, indeed, the method of Hegel, but repudiating his Pantheism, brings into dialectical form the three principal methods of proof of the Divine existence;[1] the ontological proof, which so easily led to Pantheism; the cosmological proof, in antithesis with the former, which establishes Deism in the first instance, but easily encourages new forms of Pantheism; and the teleological proof with which the pure Theistical idea stands in connexion, and is the bond of union whereby Pantheism and Deism are to be, as he hopes, mutually harmonized. Everything in the world has a moral purpose; but the deviser of moral purpose must be a person; not a personal unit in the Deistical sense, but a triple personification of the Divine unity. For the idea of personality involves that of relative individuality as compared with other individuals of the same impersonated species; wherefore the Deity can only be considered to be a Person in Triune Being. The absolute purpose can be nothing else than the one Divine personality formally existing in temporal and historical actuality, it is its very presence, involving a necessary existence. The Second Person of this Theistic Trinity is the Son; the Divine impersonation that marks the eternal origin and real possibility of creation in God; that opens out with the opening creation, pervades it in its whole nature, and devotes itself to its maintenance; not identified with it in a Pantheistic sense, but ruling with sovereign authority; "Self" and "I" as God is "Self" and "I;" the very inner self-objectivity of God. The Spirit is the third element ("moment"), the Divine will, the free character of which is love and harmony, binding the Divine Substance in one. The cosmogony of this system is equally fantastic with its theology, and need not be followed out. This phase of thought is only noticed as exhibiting the strange phenomenon of a Trinitarian Theism. The intellects, however, that have set themselves to the task of reforming Hegel are of far inferior calibre to the great high priest of Pantheism, and the hybrid character of their imaginings has either the grotesqueness of Jacob Behmen or the repulsiveness of Feuerbach and Strauss. To the English reader they are madness without method. [Saisset, Essais de la Phil. Relig.; Manuel de la Philosophie. Remusat, S. Anselme de Cantorberi. Dorner, Gesch. d. Wissenschaften in D. Harvey, Hist. and Theol. of the Creeds. Herzog, Theismus, and Religions Philosophie.]

THEODICY. This term was coined by Leibnitz in vindicating the Divine intelligence and goodness from the Fatalism of the Cartesian, [1] Die Idee der Gottheit.

School and the Pantheism of Spinoza. His Essais de Theodicée sur la bonté de Dieu, la liberté de l'homme, et l'origine de mal, appeared at Amsterdam, A.D. 1710, as an answer to the sneering scepticism of Bayle. Since that time the term has been used in German and French and American metaphysical writings, the object of which is a justification of the Divine government of the world from those who impugn its wisdom on the score of the existence of evil and manifold imperfections. Three of the latest of these writings are Sigwart, Das Problem des Bösen, oder die Theodicée, Maret's Theodicée Chrétienne, and Bledsoe's Theodicy, or Vindication of the Divine Glory as manifested in the constitution and government of the moral world. [Dict. of SECTS, HERESIES, and SCHOOLS OF THOUGHT, art. Leibnitz.]

THEODOTIANS. [MONARCHIANISM.]

THEOLOGY is the science of God; of His Being, Attributes, and Providence; in other words, of God in Himself and of the universe in relation to Him. As a science theology is not co-extensive with religion, though substantially it deals with the same facts. Religion deals with God and the universe in relation to Him so far as they can be the ground of duties and actions: theology deals with these facts so far as they can be matter for conscious and articulate thought. Accordingly, all the important acts which we perform without knowing what we do or why we do it, whose number varies directly as the simplicity and perfection of the character, are necessarily included in religion, not necessarily included in theology. Theology, again, is not normally co-extensive with faith, i.e. both the Church and the individual Christian as a rule believe more than they are able or anxious to reduce to articulate thought; and those facts which faith leaves without explanation, inference, or analysis, are not part of the proper matter of the science of theology. This points to a further distinction: the whole of our mathematical knowledge rests ultimately on mathematical science, the whole of our geological knowledge rests ultimately on geological science, the whole of our chemical knowledge rests ultimately on chemical science; but the whole of our historical knowledge does not rest upon historical science, the whole of our political knowledge does not rest upon political science, the whole of our linguistic knowledge does not rest upon linguistic science, and the whole of our theological knowledge does not rest upon theological science. Accordingly, sciences like history and theology recognise all that is known of their subjects, but, as a rule, historical problems and theological difficulties lie outside of historical and theological science; while mathematical anomalies and planetary perturbations are, even before they are explained, within the limits of mathematics and astronomy. A more important consequence of this distinction is that in the former class of sciences it is natural to begin at the beginning, and to build up everything from the first foundation: in the latter class (to which theology belongs) very much has to be done before this is possible, and the starting-point may be entirely arbitrary, because we approach the study in the possession of a considerable mass of knowledge. Thus at the outset of the sentences of Peter Lombard we find all goods classified as ends or means, goods which we enjoy and goods which we use, and then having established that we are made to enjoy God, and that He uses us, the Master proceeds to his doctrine of God. Of course, the theological knowledge which we bring with us to the study of theology is derived from education, and ultimately from authority, in this sense, that the first Christians were not scientifically convinced of Christian truth by the first preachers of Christianity. It follows that we cannot maintain with Erigena and Abelard that in the temporal order authority is prior to demonstration, but that in the logical order demonstration is prior to authority, for authority established itself in the first instance without demonstration. This is not a unique characteristic of theology, for to say nothing of ethics, the data of political science are certainly given independently of conscious reasoning; on the other hand, though political institutions are not based on political reasoning, they may be modified thereby, whereas no part of the contents of revelation can be modified by the conclusions of theological science. At the same time it is quite possible à priori that theological science may be independent, though subordinate, in this sense, that human reason may traverse the whole of the ground of revelation, and verify and classify all the data of revelation by its own enlightened and sanctified powers; and when we examine the historical development of catholic theology, we see that this has in fact been done with most of the mysteries of the faith, so that nothing now can be said to rest entirely on authority, except, perhaps, the sacramental principle; and even the authority on which this principle rests may reasonably be exhibited as a deduction from conclusions of independent science, though as regards this principle and all others the proper ground of belief to the individual is not a scientific conclusion but an authority appealing to his best desires.

SPECULATIVE THEOLOGY seems to come naturally before dogmatic, because it is part of the necessary development of Christian thought; whereas dogma is itself in some sense a necessary evil, the result of heresy, which, though inevitable, is abnormal. Speculative theology is, in the first instance, absolutely free, because it professes to deal with open questions only, or to ascertain what questions are open. In other words, speculative theology deals with such truth as is matter of opinion, or while it is matter of opinion. Hence Origen, who is the father of speculative theology, begins with an enumeration of the points determined by ecclesiastical tradition, and so begins to handle the questions which in his day ecclesiastical tradition had not answered. Of course, in handling these questions, he continually has to return upon the points which he regards as certain, in order to interpret and to harmonize and to reconcile any apparent divergencies. The method of speculative theology is twofold, inductive and dialectical; inductive so far as the theologian accumulates the data, scriptural and other, which bear upon his subject, and frames an hypothesis to account for them; dialectical in so far as he tests the ideas of which he is already in possession by applying them to the data, and at the same time arranges the data with reference to these ideas. In this double process the theologian has constantly to consider which he shall interpret by which, because until the ideas have been applied and tested they cannot be precisely grasped or understood, while the data cannot be intelligible till they have been arranged. The verification of this tentative process is to be found in the permanence of its results, which are at first provisional, and in the universal acceptance of the tentative conclusions of the individual thinker.

Nor is this method an unique characteristic of speculative theology; any science which is not able to proceed upon fixed and limited data is compelled to adopt substantially the same method. In geology, for example, the uniform action of natural agents is an idea of precisely the same order as the unchangeableness of God in theology; in both cases the extent and bearing of the idea has to be ascertained by its application, in both cases the question is continually arising whether a given fact is to be subordinated to the idea as hitherto apprehended, or whether the idea is to be further defined in accordance with the fact. Like geology, speculative theology is a progressive science in this sense, that a number of mutually supporting theories, each resting on its own independent series of probabilities, gradually acquires solidity and cohesion, and becomes a tradition among students of the subject. At the same time, it is to be noted that the progress of theology has been extremely intermittent. Its almost total collapse after the completion of St. Augustine's great works on the Trinity and the City of God was due to the collapse of civilization as much as to the repressive tendencies of suspicious orthodoxy. After that collapse, speculative theology has been in abeyance in every branch of the Catholic Church except one, where it revived in the beginning of the twelfth century and maintained its activity far into the fourteenth. Then, for the second time, speculative theology collapsed, and the grounds of its collapse deserve closer investigation than they have received. Much is due to the fact that speculative theology had become a semi-hereditary profession, much to the decline of the spiritual life of the Western Church; much also is due to the gradual emancipation of the natural man, which kept pace with that decline, so that even when spiritual life revived it was difficult to believe that spiritual subjects were sufficiently certain to bear free handling; but perhaps most of all is due to the fact that after the victory over the German Quietists, speculative theology had become too purely speculative and had no visible meaning as a defence of the Christian life. The proper function of speculative theology is to make intellectual activity a safeguard instead of a danger to faith. Thus the great Schoolmen embody the victory of Christian thought over the superficial dialectical rationalism of Roscelin, and the Pantheism of Averroes, and the Manichæism of the South of France. Thus also the Spanish Schoolmen, the contemporaries of Suarez, represent the victory of Catholicism over the heresies which accompanied the great division of the sixteenth century. The reason of this is that thought is at once quickened and guided by having to defend the integrity of an ideal which appeals to the affections and the imagination, whereas purely otiose questions, only started for the sake of being answered, soon subside in an impression that the matter in hand consists of conventional abstraction, not living realities; the rather that on such subjects all abstractions are inadequate. In its result speculative theology continually passes beyond itself, for as soon as a conclusion has met with general acceptance, it naturally takes its place in the ordinary instruction of the faithful, and becomes an aid to devotion, and when this point has been reached faith resents its disturbance. And this itself is a proof to those who admit the Divine guidance of the Church and of devout souls, that such a theological conclusion has an organic and inseparable connection with the faith once for all delivered to the saints. For the canon of St. Vincent of Lerins, as interpreted by himself, allows unbounded progress, the only limitation being that it must be a progress, not an alteration; whatever we acquire we must hold fast what has been professed everywhere, always, by all, and reject any theories which would loosen our grasp on them.

Dogmatic Theology is the rationale of dogma, that is, of the sum of the decisions which seemed good to the Church. Hence it is a peculiarity of dogmatic science that it starts from fixed conclusions rather than fixed premisses; its business is to establish an intellectual necessity, where the Church has already recognised a moral necessity, and declared it as binding on the consciences of the faithful. The decision itself may have intellectual grounds, but these are never binding on the consciences of the faithful or on the intellect of orthodox doctors. For example, the peril of polytheism certainly weighed with the Fathers at Nice, when the Church decided that the Son was of one substance with the Father; but unless Arianism had been false aliunde, this difficulty might have been adequately met by a theory of secondary worship. The decision was nevertheless binding in virtue of the authority of the Church immediately, and also on the co-ordinate authority of Holy Scripture, mediately or immediately, according to the lights of individual believers. The evidence of dogmatic theology, when it attains the highest point, coincides with the evidence of speculative theology when that also has attained its highest point, so that it is quite conceivable that if communication were accidentally suspended between two orthodox churches, the same belief might be held in both with full assurance of faith, by one as the free result of pious inquiry, by the other as a decision of authority necessary for the repression of impious error.

Except for the central truths of Christianity, which can be approached upon many sides, and corroborated by convergence of many reasons, this certainty can seldom be attained by the student of dogmatic theology; more commonly he has to be content with deductions from propositions intellectually unverified, or from premisses which, though not arbitrary themselves, are arbitrarily selected. For example, in defending the orthodox doctrine of the Last Things, it is not an arbitrary premiss to argue from the necessary truthfulness of Christ's word, but neither is it arbitrary to argue from the infinite nature of God's Love, or from the unfailing efficacy of the Atonement. The tact which decides which of these premisses will bear pressing in what direction is purely spiritual, and no intellectual gauge has been discovered for it. Perhaps the nearest approach to such a test is to be found in the history of doctrine, for this shews us a presumption independent of our wishes and of human piety for supposing that some consequences are real and others only verbal. But dogmatic theology, which undertakes to shew the internal harmony of all dogmatic decisions, to trace them into their consequences, and to shew that they are worthy of the independent assent of finite intellects, must after all be an imperfect though a progressive science, and is constantly reduced to protect its liberty by confessions of ignorance.

THEOLOGY, NATURAL. [Theism.]

THEOLOGY, SCHOLASTIC. The theology of the Middle Ages, that is of the seven centuries that intervened between the close of the patristic period and the rise of new phases of religious thought at the Reformation, is distinctly separable into two heads; the theology of the early period of the Carlovingian schools, and that of the schools properly so called, of which Anselm [A.D. 1095] marks the rise, Thomas of Aquino [A.D. 1250] the culminating period, and William of Ockham [A.D. 1330] the decay. England, France, and Germany were the three strongholds of scholasticism. The course of study in these schools embraced the "trivium," pertaining to words, or grammar, dialectics and rhetoric; and the "quadrivium," referring to things, geometry, arithmetic, astronomy, and music. These schools were engrafted on the conventual and cathedral institutions, some member of which was the scholasticus or teacher of the young. Law and physic were added in time to divinity and philosophy, and the aggregate of these various faculties with their classes became the universities of Oxford and Paris, "studium generale or universale." The students of Paris exceeded its citizens in number. Cologne, Fulda, and Prague had similar schools of learning, though of inferior renown. The Papal court perceived the vast influence that these schools were about to exercise, and at once extended to them its distinguished favour. In the earliest of these schools John Scotus Erigena became the precursor of Spinoza and Hegel, as Ockham was of Luther and Melanchthon in the later. The mystical Neo-Platonicism of Dionysius (wrongly termed the Areopagite), reproduced in Maximus, gave rise to the heartier mysticism of the canons of St. Victoire, which, however distinct in nature, was minutely interwoven with the substance of scholastic theology. The dialectics of Aristotle, translated by Boëthius, were as the life-blood of scholasticism, and suggested to Anselm the notion of converting theology into an exact science; yet dialectics only served for hair-splitting distinctions; fundamental verities are incapable of verbal demonstrations.

The term "scholastic" in later Greek signified one who devoted himself to science and philosophy; it was more generally applied to the teacher, but sometimes also to the pupil. Quinctilian uses the term of disputants in the former; and it was also applied, in general, to "men of letters." No better name, therefore, could have been hit upon to designate the principals of the Carlovingian Schools, such as Alcuin, John Scotus Erigena, &c. The instruction in these schools had a direct relation to the teaching of the Church, but with a certain philosophical direction given to it, which was inevitable where the chair of the philosophical and of the theological faculties were filled by the same doctor. This close union of theology and philosophy is the distinctive feature, or rather it constitutes the very essence, of scholasticism. Theology, however, was queen over all; "fides præcedens intellectum;" it was as the Beatrice of Dante, followed by philosophy with adoring regard. The discussion of the question of transubstantiation in the middle of the eleventh century, and the collision of two such spirits as Lanfranc and Berengarius determined the immediate development of scholasticism. Dialectical reasoning was the weapon employed by both. While Lanfranc insisted on the paramount authority of tradition as the end of all controversy, Berengarius claimed the right of human reasoning to be heard, and would recognise nothing as Christian truth that was incapable of dialectical demonstration. The way was thus prepared for Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, the real founder of scholastic theology.

Christian doctrine, an expansion in the first five centuries from the germ inherent in the Church, was considered to be finally determined; hence the authority of the ancient Fathers was all-sufficient in the opinion of the schools. But as these doctrines were in many cases the result of human reasoning from scriptural data, the element of reason was by no means ignored, though Scripture and tradition were exalted to the principal place. Reason can only have its issue in systematic arrangement and order, therefore it became the business of the schools to harmonize and classify the doctrinal products of preceding ages, and to claim for theology the exactness of science. Scripture was the avowed basis of the scheme, but it was Scripture of the Vulgate translation as received by Church authority, and interpreted by tradition; thus while implicit reverence was paid to Scripture, the foundation of scholasticism was really laid in ecclesiastical authority and tradition.

I. Of scholastic theology, as a definite system, Anselm must be considered to be the originator. The relations of faith and reason were determined by him; faith did not ignore the function of reason, neither did reason in his system transgress its legitimate boundary lines or interfere with the province of faith, which was the error that he combated in Roscelin. Yet the veritics of faith he held to be discoverable by scientific reasoning, as Alan of Ryssel [d. 1202] also maintained, but later schoolmen denied. Thus Anselm declared that the dogmata of positive religion might be argued out as matters of necessary deduction [De fide Trinitatis, and Cur Deus Homo], to the conviction not only of Jewish, but also of heathen unbelief. Thomas Aquinas seems to have had this notion polemically in view [Summa Theol. Sec. Sec. i. 5, 8; and in Boeth. de Trin. Proœm. ii. 1]. Anselm's Monologium was a first approach towards a systematic Summa Theologiæ.

The next pair of scholastic gladiators were Bernard of Clairvaux and Abelard; Bernard was the earnest Churchman grounding his system on faith, yet preparing the way for the warmer mysticism of the Victorian school, by insisting upon the living operative qualities of a loving faith, and claiming for it such high ecstatic flights as prepare the spirit of man on earth for the glorious realities of heaven, "inopinatis excessibus avolare interdum contemplando ad illa sublimia consuevit." Abelard was the rationalist of his day, with a tendency towards Pelagian notions of man's free power for good; as a pupil both of William of Champeaux and of Roscelin, he agreed wholly with neither as regards the doctrine of universals, but settled down upon that tertium quid which has found acceptance in later times, CONCEPTUALISM. [Ritter; Cousin, Œuvres inédits d'Abelard; Hauréau.] He expresses much contempt for the non-reasoning qualities with which the schools were beginning to invest the notion of faith, "Fervor fidei, qui ea quæ dicuntur antequam intelligat credit, et prius recipit quam quæ ipsa sint videat." Like Anselm, he professed great respect for tradition, but it was a tradition limited to the teaching of Scripture, and the scriptural deductions of the creeds. He seems to have intended to destroy the authority of the Fathers in his work Sic et Non, in which the "yea" of one father is opposed by the "nay" of another, and no attempt is made to reconcile the antagonism, or to shew how two writers viewing the same subject from different points of view may exhibit differences that are only of an external character, the nucleus of truth in either case being one and the same. His canon as regards the study of the Fathers is sound, where he says that they are to be read "non cum credendi necessitate, sed cum judicandi libertate." By applying his metaphysical principles to positive theology, Abelard laid himself open to a charge of teaching tritheism, and was condemned at Soissons [A.D. 1121]. He was an intrepid dialectician, never shrinking from any length to which syllogism might lead him; but his really brilliant qualities were somewhat spoiled by an overwhelming opinion of his own intellectual power. Hugo a Sancto Victore, canon of St. Victoire, the founder of the Victorine school [A.D. 1140], also made Scripture and tradition the basis of his system of theology. His Summa is the first system of doctrinal theology that has descended to us from the schools. It took the form of a digest of patristical sentences, synodical definitions, &c., and led the way to the "Sentences" of Robert Pulleyne, Archdeacon of Rochester, and next to the great work of the Master of Sentences. His work not only cites digested passages, but indicates the counterhitting of opponents, and then, unlike the Sic et Non of Abelard, disposes of each question by a determination based always upon authority and tradition. His work De Sacramentis, written in free style, is one of the most considerable contributions of the schools to theology. His method gave a useful direction to that of Peter of Lombard and Thomas of Aquino, while his mysticism derived through Maximus from the Pseudo-Areopagite, gave a tone to the kindred writings of Bonaventura and Gerson. His pupil Richard a Sancto Victore [A.D. 1173] excelled him in the more showy and brilliant qualities of intellect, but fell far short of his geniality and simplicity of character. Theology was placed by both these canons of St. Victoire as the centre and sun of all other sciences and arts, which only shine by its reflected light, and are as its satellites, "omnes artes naturales divinæ scientiæ famulantur." The sententiarii, or compilers of "sentences" digested from the authoritative writings of the Church, were headed by Robert Pulleyne in the first half of the twelfth century, whose eight books of sentences, however, were almost immediately eclipsed by the exhaustive Liber Sententiarum of Peter Lombard. This work was intended to put an end to all controversy among the "scrutatores et garruli ratiocinatores" of the schools, meaning more especially such disputants as Abelard; but in effect it only enlarged the arena of discussion by the suggestion of an infinity of topics. The magnitude of Lombard's plan and the width of its range secured for him the title of "Master of Sentences;" a host of scholiasts and commentators followed in his wake, who were themselves masters of renown, such as Alexander of Hales, the Irrefragable Doctor, Thomas of Aquino, Duns Scotus, Ockham, &c. But perpetual syllogistic wrangling is wearying, and Walter of St. Victoire inveighed against the four labyrinths of France, Abelard and Gilbert of La Porrée, Peter Lombard, and his namesake of Poictiers, and attempted to abate the nuisance by hard words, which John of Salisbury performed much more effectually by his wit.

II. The introduction of translations of various works of Aristotle, who had hitherto been known to Europe only as the supreme authority in dialectics, gave an entirely new direction to scholastic thought. But they were translations at fourth hand, coming over through Syriac, Arabic, and Latin versions. Fresh life was thereby given to the schools, which then rapidly attained their culminating point. The use, however, of translations, into which Mahommedan translators had imported their own philosophic glosses, was like playing with edged tools, and Aristotle became charged with the Pantheism that emanated really from Avicenna [Ibn Sinna], Alpharabius [El Farabi], Avicebron [Ibn Gebirol], and Averroes [Ibn Roshd]. Amalric of Bena and David of Dinanto found this to their cost. It was during this period that many of the distinctive tenets of the Roman Church and Pelagianizing theories of the schools were developed; such as the "treasury of grace" that issued in the sale of indulgences, and the Immaculate Conception, both of which dogmata were first floated by Alexander of Hales, though the latter is indicated in the Epistle of St. Bernard to the canons of Lyons [A.D. 1245]. His theology was a practical science modified by mysticism. A greater name is that of Albertus Magnus [A.D. 1205], natural philosopher and theologian, whose massive learning and experiments of the laboratory obtained for him the character of a magician. In theology the highest faith was regarded by him as a "fides formata;" theology itself was "scientia de his quæ ad salutem pertinent," and therefore eminently practical, although there was something of the Pantheism of Ibn Gebirol in his notion of a gradually descending emanation of all things from God.

Thomas of Aquino, greatest of the Schoolmen, was born A.D. 1225, and died at the early age (considering the bulk of his writings) of forty-nine [A.D. 1274]. These works were composed during the last twenty years of his life, from the time of his advance to the doctorate. The first five volumes are commentaries on the works of Aristotle; commentaries follow on the sentences of "The Master;" next another volume of theological questions, the Summa, commentaries on Scripture, and seventy-three minor pieces, among which are some "dubiæ fidei," while others are evidently notes of lectures.

Thomas refused the archbishopric of Naples, augmented with the revenues of the monastery of St. Peter "ad aram," begging of Pope Clement IV. that he might be allowed to remain faithful to the vows of poverty and humility, and the garb of his order. It was under Clement's pontificate that the Summa Theologiæ was written, consisting of three parts, 1. Natural theology, and on the nature of God and of His creatures; 2. Prima secundæ, the general principles of morals, and Secunda secundæ, vices and virtues in detail; 3. Of the Incarnation and the Sacraments. It is a work that has always been regarded as the most perfect body of Divinity, as well for its doctrinal excellence as for its methodical arrangement. The author sets forth with the assertion that the vision of God is man's highest good; but this transcends the finite reason of man, and can only be attained in a mediate manner through His works in creation, the highest aim and attainment of ancient philosophers. Natural theology however, is only the "preamble of faith," and is capable of mathematical demonstration. But above this is the region of faith, which man can only penetrate by supernatural inspiration and with the aid of Scripture. Theology is a science, as other generalizations of human knowledge are sciences; but it has faith for its guiding light, as these latter are determined by reason. As other sciences are based upon axioms the germ of all after-development, so articles of faith are the axioms of theological science from whence one dogma after another has been evolved. Theological science is speculative rather than practical. This relegation of theology to a higher region makes all real antagonism with philosophy to be impossible. They cannot really clash with each other; both of them emanating from different phases of divine truth; "gratia naturam non tollit sed perficit," and as grace is the perfecting of nature, so reason in the natural world, and sensible substance (res sensibiles) bear an imitative resemblance to things divine (aliquale vestigium in se divinæ imitationis retinent). Like his teacher Albert, he was a follower of Dionysius in his notion of a continuous emanation of all things from God; but whereas Albert derived creation direct from the Being of God, and so verged closely on Pantheism, Thomas in a more guarded manner represented the active will of God as the source of all things, which as Thought wills and creates. It is a different side of the same sunken rock. On the whole the great work of Thomas Aquinas is for the cause of theological truth a κτῆμα εἰς ἀεί. His friend the Franciscan Bonaventura was completely eclectic. Aristotelian in his philosophy, he was also influenced by the traditions of Platonicism, more especially as they were reflected in the mystical school of St. Victoire, and was the devoted scholastic follower of Maximus and Dionysius. He was loyal to the scholastic system, but was less bound by its trammels than others, and conveyed his teaching in a freer, because a less dialectical form than his predecessors. There was a practical piety also in all he said and wrote, that was the more striking from its contrast with the general aridity of scholastic reasonings; as the kindred spirit Gerson said of him, "Bonaventura is as far removed as possible from minute trifling (curiositate); not introducing matter foreign to his subject, nor, as is the custom of others, obscuring doctrine by philosophical terms; but while he has a regard for the enlightenment of the understanding, he makes all have reference to piety and religious affection." Bonaventura is a fair specimen of the better light thrown upon the schools by mysticism; for it gave a freer scope to the contemplative principle, and raised his reasonings into the domain of wisdom to which the mere dialectician could scarcely ever penetrate.

Raymand Lully, of the same period, had greater originality, which he shewed in a syncretic fusion of principles that amounted to something far more than eclecticism. Strife was already setting in between rival schools of thought, but he took far wider ground than the mere hope of reconciling wrangling schoolmen, and aimed at confuting Moorish philosophers and converting Saracens by means of his "ars generalis;" a conglomerate of the first principles of diffusive truth in the whole encyclopædia of sciences. Aristotle and Averroes, the Cabbala and the Gospels, all supplied their contingent; and if the wild scheme attracted a school of followers known as Lullists, it shews how completely the human spirit had begun to yearn for something more Catholic and genial than the narrow spirit of the schools. Such a demand for reform was the sure herald of the decline of scholasticism.

Duns Scotus, born A.D. 1274, was named from Duns on the Scottish border, his native place; he was of the Franciscan order, and the determined opponent of the Thomist or Dominican scheme. But he had the same reverential regard for Church doctrine as Aquinas. The points of difference lay rather in metaphysical subtleties. He argued every question himself in a fearless, self-dependent spirit, and objected to Thomas Aquinas his servile devotion to Aristotle. This drew upon him the wrath of the Dominican fraternity; and the wars of the rival schools led in direct course to the dissolution of scholasticism. Duns Scotus was the champion of human and divine liberty of action, both of which had been called in question in some degree under preceding systems; while the Thomists were the advocates of grace. The doctrine of the Immaculate Conception was a prominent feature in the Scotist system. The theory was not first started by Scotus, for Alexander of Hales had already avowed it, and before him St. Bernard indicated its existence; but it was brought into public notice by him at Paris, and the principle was firmly rooted by his preaching in the mind of the people; though in point of exact definition it was vague as yet and undetermined. It is commonly asserted, he said, that the Virgin was born in original sin; he disputed the point, and concluded by declaring that had He so willed God might have saved the Virgin from every trace of original sin; or He might have redeemed her from it after a momentary contact; or He might have allowed her to continue for some time under this common condition of humanity, and then set her wholly free from it. "Which of these three hypotheses, he says, be the true one God alone can know, but it seems most suitable to ascribe to the Blessed Virgin the more excellent condition, provided that it militates not against the authority of the Church or of Scripture." Of all logicians Scotus was the most severely dialectical, and for this reason he was known as the "subtle doctor," though the Thomists called him "Quodlibetarius" in allusion to his "quodlibetarian" method of stating the pro and con of important arguments, and leaving his hearers to draw the conclusion for themselves, as Abelard had already done as a "sententiarius" in his Sic et Non. If Duns Scotus approached more nearly to any of his predecessors it was to William of Champeaux, founder of the dialectical school of St. Victor and preceptor of Roscelin. His system was built upon Aristotle, in his day sufficiently well known in various translations; but Platonicism also lay at the foundation, the two great sources of Christian philosophy having always been combined in the Neo-Platonic scheme that descended to the schools through Porphyry and Boethius. Theology was considered by him to be as much a science as philosophy; but it was a practical not a speculative science, "operatio eorum quæ persuadentur," which was the converse of the Thomist theory. He took a completely material view of original sin; it was not concupiscence, for that from the first was connaturally in man; but it was "ex fomite." Our fleshly nature is tainted and poisoned in natural procreation. The punishment of original sin lay in the deprivation of the Beatific Vision. With every intention of being severely orthodox, he gave a Semi-Pelagian tone to the doctrines of grace. The two penitential conditions of ATTRITION and CONTRITION, which are combined by Thomas Aquinas under the latter term, were first disjoined by Scotus, and his followers ever afterwards carefully separated the one from the other [Sec. IV. dist. xiv. qu. 2]. In other respects, while expressing himself as a zealous Catholic, he enounced a philosophy whose principles were wholly heterodox. But his metaphysics were obscure, and did no harm to the many, while his theological terms carried a Catholic sound, and he was safe. In philosophy he prepared the way for modern scepticism; the formula of realism, to which he gave fresh life, was the same at the close as in the first rise of the philosophy of the schools, "unity of substance, plurality in its manifestation." Descartes and Spinoza affirmed the same, each according to his own modification [Rousselot, H. de la Ph. du Moy. Age, iii. 19-27]. He had learned from Avicembron to believe in the materiality of all existent substance, in which he was followed by Hobbes. With greater soundness he announced the inductive principle, in anticipation of Bacon and Newton [Comm. Sent. i. 3]. Thus, in more than one aspect, he was the connecting link between the philosophy of the schools and of more recent times. He died A.D. 1308, aged only thirty-four years. Apoplexy was the cause of death, but the monks of Cologne buried him perhaps with too much haste. The words inscribed on his tomb tell his history in brief outline,—

> "Scotia me genuit, Anglia me suscepit, > Gallia me docuit, Colonia me tenuit."

Roger Bacon, known as the "admirable doctor," was another who led to the decay of scholasticism by his hardy innovating spirit. Scholasticism could only run in the groove to which it had been fitted. Neology was its destruction. The curriculum of Bacon's studies had been very discursive, stretching away over the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, poetry, rhetoric, history, mathematics, philosophy, medicine, chemistry, jurisprudence, theology, to which may also be added astrology and alchemy; gunpowder, if not actually discovered by him, was known to him. His mind was "strongly compounded of almost prophetic gleams of the future course of science and the best principles of the inductive philosophy, with a more than usual credulity in the superstitions of his own time" [Hallam, Introd. L. Eur. ii. 33]. Lord Bacon had evidently made much use of his namesake's writings. Bacon was accused of heretical teaching, and was condemned to imprisonment by the general of his order. He died after six years' confinement at Oxford, A.D. 1284.

Durandus a St. Porciano, a convert to nominalism from the realist party, made a more complete severance of theology from philosophy; theology, as with Duns Scotus, being purely a practical science. The right knowledge of God, he said, can never be attained by à priori reasoning, but only from the word of God as interpreted by the Church. It is not the province of theology to lead man to a knowledge of God as He is, but to shew him the way to everlasting life, and for that reason to generate within his soul faith towards God; this being determined by the will, the theology that is built upon it is resolved into a creation of the will of man, and is a purely practical science. The severance of philosophy from religion was evidently meant by him to tend to the glorification of the latter.

III. William of Ockham, a Franciscan nominalist, "the wittiest of the schoolmen," as Hooker terms him, and the best writer on ecclesiastical authority before the revival of literature, as Selden says, himself no great admirer of that authority, was born about A.D. 1290 at Ockham in Surrey. He was a Fellow of Merton College, Oxford, and a pupil of Duns Scotus, and was a politician rather than a divine. The scholastic term of "gratia de congruo" was created by him, though it is substantially one with the "dispositio ad gratiam" of Thomas [I. dist. xli. qu. 1. art. 3]. His hardihood of assertion led him to make use of Pelagian expressions that were frequently noticed by the leaders of the Reformation. In the more congenial atmosphere of politics he was a turbulent demagogue, and for that reason he stood in higher favour than any other schoolmen with reformers. Luther terms him "carus magister meus," and Melanchthon speaks of him as "deliciæ quondam nostræ." He was the reviver of nominalism. The realist theory had become so completely interwoven in the entire texture of the scholastic system, that its period of decay prepared the way for the breaking up of the entire web. Ockham hastened the process. He was mainly instrumental in the public burning at Paris of the papal bull "Ausculta fili," addressed to Philip the Fair. He was, as an agitator for papal reform, a continual thorn in the side of Boniface VIII. and John XXII. He inveighed bitterly against papal avarice [Defensor. adv. John XXII. Papam; Brown, Fascic. Rer. Fug. et Exp.], and demanded the return of his order to its original constitution of poverty. For this he was cast off by the "Angelic order," and pursued by the Pope with such unrelenting hostility as to force him to take refuge at the court of the Emperor Louis of Bavaria. Ockham was engaged upon an attack on his persecutor when death stopped his pen, A.D. 1347. The Augustinianism of Bradwardine, and the revival of mysticism, in a practical rather than philosophical application to divinity, by Gerson, are the only two remaining features that redeem scholasticism from insignificance until the dawn of the Reformation.

For a more detailed history of the subject the reader is referred to the DICTIONARY of SECTS, HERESIES, and SCHOOLS OF THOUGHT. [Hist. Lit. de la France, Bened. Ritter, Gesch. d. Phil. Cousin, Œuvres inédits d'Abelard. Hauréau, Phil. Schol. Neander and Gieseler, K. Gesch. Baur, Dogmen Gesch. and Versöhnung. Jourdain, Traductions d'Aristotle. Standenmaier and Christlieb, Erig. Remusat and Hasse, Anselm. Renan, Averroes. Bishop Thirlwall's Life of Aquinas. Encyc. Met. Biogr. Lawrence, Bamp. Lect. iii. and notes. Rousselot. Baumgarten. Crusius, De Real. et Nom. Cave, Hist. Lit.]

THEOPHANY, in patristical language, is synonymous with EPIPHANY, and signifies the manifestation of God to His servants under the Old Covenant; the Birth of Christ, and His Baptism, both of which were formerly celebrated on the same day [CHRISTMAS]. Thus Gregory of Nazianzum, in his homily on the joint feast of the Nativity and Epiphany [Or. 38], says, ὄνομα δὲ τῷ φανῆναι μὲν θεοφάνια, τῷ δὲ γεννᾶσθαι γενέθλια [see CHRISTMAS]. The term also signifies the future advent of Christ as Judge of all; so Chrysostom on Tit. ii. 11. "He here designates two Epiphanies; and in truth they are twofold, the first of grace, the second of retribution and justice." Similarly, Theophylact on v. 13. The word occurs in classical Greek only as a neuter-plural, meaning an exposition of the collective images of the gods [Herod. 1]. In ecclesiastical Greek the same form is found, also the neuter-singular, but it occurs more frequently as a feminine noun; so Suidas, ἐπιφανεία, ἡ τοῦ Θεοῦ φανέρωσις, θηλυκόν· οὐδετέρως δὲ πληθυντικὸν; τὰ θεοφάνεια· ἡ εὐθεῖα τὸ θεοφάνειον. In either form it means only the manifestation of the Deity; if it finds any parallel in classical Greek it would be in the term Ἔλευσις. The term can never involve the notion of a self-manifestation of the Deity in His inscrutable Being. Every revelation of Himself to man must be limited to spiritual revelation; for God is Spirit, and His Nature is absolutely of impossible conception to man, "Whom no man hath seen nor can see" [1 Tim. vi. 16], "No man hath seen God at any time" [John i. 18], "There shall no man see Me and live" [Exod. xxxiii. 20]. Spirit can only communicate with spirit. The spirit which God gave to man, when He breathed into his being the breath of life, is the sole medium of communication between man and his Maker. None of the Theophanies, therefore, of the Old Testament, in which God is said to have appeared to the bodily senses of His more favoured servants can be understood of the Absolute Nature of the Deity. In condescension to the limited faculties of man, such manifestation of His Presence as they could receive was made to them, either immediately by dream or ecstatic vision, or mediately by the intervention of some angelic being, invested for the time with the Divine authority and plenary excellence. So Dionysius [Pseudo-Areopagita de Cœl. Hierarch. iv.] says, "Theophanies were vouchsafed to the saints in modes of expression suitable to the nature of the Deity by certain holy visions proportionate to man's being." Upon which his scholiast, Maximus, notes, "By theophany is meant, not a manifestation of the Deity, disclosing His Being (ὅ τι ποτέ ἐστι), for that can never be; but because His saints were thought worthy of a Divine irradiation (ἐλλάμψεως), by means of holy visions congruous to them (αὐτοῖς ἀναλόγων), which he says were conveyed to them by angelic means." So also Theodoret: "God, on rare occasions, appeared to His people of old, in such manifestations as they were able to bear [συμμέτρους τοῖς ὁρῶσι τὰς ἐπιφανείας ποιούμενος. Serm. vi. De App.]." Hence John Damascene [Orth. F. iii. 1] terms these manifestations Θεοφανείαι τυπικαὶ, as being symbolical and not revealing the very substance of the Deity, which is impossible.

The Fathers so generally assert that the Logos appeared to holy men of old, that we may accept this as the positive faith of the Church, "Patriarchis varie visum" [Tert. de Præsc.] But it could only be as some angelic form that the Second Person of the ever-blessed Trinity could have appeared. The Word pre-existed in the mere glory of the Son of God, affected as yet by no personal union with the manhood; "before Abraham was I AM." If God, then, "at sundry times and in divers manners spake in times past unto the Fathers by the prophets," and by vision, this would seem more especially to refer to the operation of God the Son, Whose authority and more immediate presence were imparted to the angelic excellence that announced His will. As of old, "holy men spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," and as the same divine influence still leads the devout heart on "from grace to grace," so we may imagine that a yet more substantive manifestation of the Divine Presence was vouchsafed, when God by His blessed angels made known His will to man. They were His spokesmen, as the Lord Himself declared of Aaron, "He shall be thy spokesman unto the people; and he shall be to thee instead of a mouth, and thou shalt be to him instead of God" [Exod. iv. 16; see Mal. ii. 7]. Some distinction also may be observed between any ordinary manifestation of God's Will by ministering spirits [Gen. xvi. 7; Acts xii. 7] that stand about His throne, and those more solemn utterances when the Deity vouchsafed to descend for His own all-wise purposes to closer communion with the creatures of His hand. Still, wherever a visible appearance is mentioned, we must imagine the presence of those ministers of His, whose pure nature, as "flaming fire,"[1] is far more spiritual than man's; yet far more closely allied to that weak nature, than to the infinitely distant and wholly incomprehensible substance of the Deity. That they have a body, though of spiritual substance, is very evident from Scripture, and therefore they have ever acted as mediators to convey to man a knowledge of the Divine Will [Acts vii. 53. Angels].

The foregoing observations may serve to explain most of the passages in the Bible in which God is said to have appeared to man. The preface to the Book of Job is prelusive to the dramatic action of the dialogue that follows; the warning of Micaiah the son of Imlah [1 Kings xxii. 19] may have been founded upon vision, or even upon a clearsighted forecast of evil arising out of present complications. The reproach of Cain [Gen. iv. 6, 7] may have been the voice of God speaking with him through the conscience. The account of the creation may have been communicated by an angel to our first father, as Milton has supposed [Paradise Lost, vii. 110]; or by vision to Moses, which is Hugh Miller's idea [Testim. of Rocks]. But that which the sacred writers record as having witnessed themselves stands on very different ground. That they were sensibly impressed with the reality of the manifestation made by them is most certain, but how that reality was so impressed upon their senses may have varied in different instances. Such revelations as those in Ezekiel [i.], Isaiah [vi.], Daniel, and Zechariah, were evidently made by vision; the vision of Cornelius [Acts x. 3], and the ecstatic manifestation [2 Cor. xii. 4; see Acts xviii. 9, xxii. 17] with which St. Paul was favoured, are similar instances; when St. John in the Isle of Patmos was "in the Spirit on the Lord's day" [Rev. i. 10], it was the inner sense, and not the seeing eye or hearing ear, that conveyed the impression of heavenly things home to the brain. The Urim and Thummim was another channel of communication between the Most High and His servants. But it is impossible to have faith in the Bible, and to doubt whether or no the three angels appeared unto Abraham "as he sat in the tent door" on the plain of Mamre [Gen. xviii. 1], or that one of them of higher dignity than the other two ministering spirits spake with authority [3, 13, 17, 20, &c.], even as the Lord Jesus after His resurrection was first seen with two attendant angels [John xx. 12, 14]. Elsewhere myriads of heavenly beings form the bodyguard of the Lord of Hosts, whom Moses represents as coming with ten thousand of His saints [Deut. xxxiii. 4; see Jude 14]; and as in the vision of judgment, "thousand thousands ministered unto Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before Him" [Dan. vii. 10; see 2 Kings vi. 17]. The administrative angel of the Lord [Acts xii. 7] conveyed a manifestation of God's continued presence [Exod. xxxiii. 14, 15, xxxiv. 5; Isa. lxiii. 9], as "the angel of the covenant" [Mal. iii. 1], the symbol of whose presence was the cloud of darkness and pillar of light, suggestive of penal terrors and the glory of loving-kindness; "gracious to whom He will be gracious, and shewing mercy to whom He will shew mercy,"

[1] Τοὺς θρόνους φησὶ πυρίνους εἶναι, καὶ αὐτοὺς δὲ τοὺς ὑπερτάτους Σεραφεὶμ ἐμπρηστὰς ὄντας, ἐκ τῆς ἐπωνυμίας ἐμφαίνει, καὶ τὴν πυρὸς ἰδιότητα καὶ ἐνεργείαν αὐτοῖς ἀπονέμει, καὶ ὅλος ἀνῷ καὶ κάτω τὴν ἐμπύριον τιμᾷ ἐκκρίτως τυποπλαστίαν [Dionys. Areopag. Cœl. Hierarch. xv. 2].

"keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty" [Exod. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 7]. But since grace and truth have come by Jesus Christ, "the only-begotten Son Which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" [John i. 18]. He alone is "the way, the truth, and the life;" and as He has already revealed Himself in His glorified body to His more favoured servants [Acts vii. 55; Rev. i. 13, xiv. 14], so we believe that He shall come again with all His holy angels, and the glory of that Theophany can never again be veiled in darkness. The day of mists and uncertainty will have passed away, the day of God will be there.

THEOPHOROI. A mystical name assumed by some of the early Christians, signifying that they were the temples of God. It is not unlikely that it had a special reference to the Presence of Christ, God and Man, in those who faithfully and devoutly received the Holy Eucharist. St. Ignatius, in the inscriptions of his epistles, designates himself Ἰγνάτιος ὁ καὶ Θεοφόρος, and it is recorded in the Acts of his martyrdom [Grabe, Spiceleg. ii. 10] that he adopted the same title in his replies to the Emperor Trajan when on his examination. On being asked by Trajan what the word meant, Ignatius answered, "one who carries Christ in his heart;" and on being asked if he, then, carried the Crucified in his heart, "Even so," replied the martyr, "for it is written, I will dwell in them and walk in them." The name is shewn by Bishop Pearson [Vindic. Ignat.] to have been used in this mystical sense by several of the Fathers. It was probably not common at any time, but is an illustration of the manner in which the orthodox followers of our Lord always called themselves after His Name, and kept keenly in view the union which He establishes between Himself and the members of His Mystical Body.

THEOSOPHY. This name is given to a quaint system of philosophical mysticism originating in modern times with Jacob Böhm or Behmen [A.D. 1575-1624], a shoemaker of Görlitz, a town of Prussia, half way between Dresden and Breslau. Böhm's theories were largely derived from Paracelsus, the Swiss alchemist and mystic; and Paracelsus [A.D. 1493-1541], again, had learned at the feet of the Neo-Platonists, Plotinus, Jamblichus, and Proclus.

Theosophy claims to be the knowledge of God and of Divine things attained by contemplation, and consequent illumination, as distinguished from theology, which is the name given to similar knowledge attained by reasoning from revelation. It also claims the power of penetrating into many secrets of nature—viewed as the Divine Cosmos—by the same gift of illumination. The whole system is, in fact, a strange mixture of the physical with the spiritual; material forces being often credited with spiritual power.

The life of Jacob Böhm was one of very narrow experiences, as has been the case with many deep thinkers among the Germans, yet his works have had much influence upon the religious life of large numbers both in Germany and England. The first of them was the Aurora, which he published in the year 1612, and which was shortly followed by a work entitled The Three Principles. These books brought Böhm into much notice with the learned, and into much trouble with the Lutheran pastors of his neighbourhood. He continued to write, however, for the remaining twelve years of his life; and his collected works were published in 1730, under the title Theosophia Revelata, in six volumes. An English translation of them was made, in two quarto volumes, by William Law, whose mysticism was that of Böhm de-Germanized, and had great influence on the mind of Wesley. Böhm was also a favourite authority with Sir Isaac Newton, among whose papers were found large extracts from his works, which Law believed to have been the foundation of many of Newton's own speculations. Much of Schelling's philosophy is also drawn from the same source.

The central idea of theosophy is that of emanation, Böhm's mysticism all tending to a demonstration that finite existences of every kind are an efflux from the One Infinite Existence, and that such an efflux is a necessary attribute of God's own being. All things come from a working-will of the holy, triune, incomprehensible God, Who manifests Himself through an external efflux of fire, light, and spirit. Angels and men are the true and real offspring of God, their life originating in the divine fire, from which light and love are generated in them. This triune life in God is the perfection of being, and the loss of it constituted the Fall of angels and men. Thus man having been made a living image of the Divine Nature and endowed with immortality, he exchanged the light, life, and Spirit of God for the light, life, and spirit of the world. He died to the influences of the Spirit of God on the very day of his transgression, but remained subject to all the external influences of the world: and the restoration of the influence of the Spirit constitutes the work of redemption and sanctification. Christ restored to men the germ of their paradisiacal life, which is possessed by all through new birth and His indwelling. No son of Adam can be lost, except by the wilful loss of this paradisiacal germ of the Divine Life; and its development is the development of salvation.

In the hands of Law (a man too little appreciated), the theosophy of Böhm assumed a much more reasonable form than that in which it had been clothed by its author, whose language was a medley of alchemy, obscure analogies, and false etymologies. It was then exhibited as a philosophy of redemption and spiritual life which only wanted the key-stone of sacramental psychology to make it a firm system of truth.

In recent times a volume has been privately printed by Mr. Christopher Walton, a goldsmith on Ludgate Hill, entitled Notes and Materials for an adequate Biography of William Law, comprising an elucidation of the scope and contents of the writings of Jacob Böhm, and of his great commentator Dionysius Andreas Freher, &c., 1854, which contains an immense body of information on the subject; and although presented in an undigested, and so unreadable, form, this work (which has been given to most public libraries) will be found very useful to any student who ventures upon the subject of theosophy.

THEOTOKOS. Θεοτόκος, Deipara, Mater Dei, Mother of God. [1] A title of the Blessed Virgin Mary. [2] An ecclesiastical term, adopted at the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, to assert the doctrine of the Divinity of our Lord's Person. The title was adopted not so much with a view of paying honour to the Blessed Virgin, as to her Divine Son.

The truth which it was designed to teach is that although two natures are united in one Christ, yet there are not two persons but one. Our Blessed Lord was a Divine Person from all eternity, and when He became incarnate He did not cease to be the Person He had been before. There was therefore no change or interruption of His identity, for the Godhead became incarnate, not by the conversion of the Godhead into flesh, but by taking of the manhood into God. That which He took was not a human person, but human nature. If He had taken a human person two persons would have co-existed in one, which would have involved a contradiction, or, if it had been possible, the human nature attaching to the human person would have belonged to that person alone; but by taking human nature into the Godhead, He sanctified a common nature of which His people are made partakers [Hooker, Ecc. Pol. v. 52, sec. 3; Wilberforce on the Incarnation, c. vi.]. When He took our flesh upon Him, He did not become another person than He was before, for then He could not have said "Before Abraham was, I AM." The consciousness which is an attribute of identity remained undisturbed by the taking of the manhood into God, and therefore personality must be ascribed not to the human, but to the Divine nature of our Lord. Although the nature which He took of the substance of His Mother was human, the person who was born was Divine, and this was the truth declared in the adoption of the term θεοτόκος. It is not of course meant that the Blessed Virgin was the mother of the Godhead of our Lord, but that the human nature, which He assumed of her substance, was so united to the Divinity that the person begotten of her was God as well as man. In this sense she might be called the mother of God. Further than this, if it be alleged that, since the Godhead was not derived from the substance of the Virgin, but existed from all eternity, the title Mother of God expresses more than the Church meant, it may be answered that it is in accordance with the well-known usus loquendi in Scripture, whereby God is said to have purchased the Church with His own blood [Acts xx. 28], and the Son of Man is said to be already in heaven whilst yet on earth. This Communicatio Idiomatum is only intelligible on the principle that whatever may be predicated of our Lord in either of His two natures belongs to Him as one Christ, i.e. that the properties of both His natures are the properties of His Person. In the same sense as St. Paul could attribute crucifixion to God, could the Church attribute to Him birth of a human mother. The phrase θεοτόκος is implicitly sanctioned by the phrase αἷμα Θεοῦ [Liddon's Bampton Lectures, p. 258, note, 2nd ed.].

Although the word θεοτόκος is not itself found in Scripture, its equivalent is seen in the words of Elizabeth, ἡ μήτηρ τοῦ Κυρίου μου. Equivalent expressions are also used by Irenæus and Ignatius [Waterland, vol. v. 414]. Alexander of Alexandria uses the term θεοτόκος, as does also St. Athanasius, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, and Origen. The denial of our Lord's Divinity by the Arians brought the title into more common use than it had before obtained. It was used by Gregory Theologus in his discourses on the Nicene Faith, and in a letter addressed to the priest Cledonius in which we read, "If any man believe not Mary to be Theotokos, he has no part in God." The Nestorian heresy was, however, the cause of its being accepted by the Church as an article of faith. Like other heresies this was a recoil from others which had gone before. The Arians had denied the divinity of our Lord, and the Apollinarians had so confused the two natures that they lost sight entirely of the distinctive peculiarities of His humanity. Recoiling from this error there were some who so insisted on the distinctness of our Lord's humanity as to regard it in the light of a separate personality. Amongst these was a priest Anastasius, who in a sermon preached at St. Sophia's at Constantinople, in Advent A.D. 428, said, "Let no one call Mary Theotokos, for she is a human creature of whom God could not be born." Nestorius the archbishop was present, and approved, and on the Christmas day following he preached a sermon, in which he called the title heathenish, and spoke of Mary's son as "a mere man, the organ employed and the vesture worn by God." A controversy having been provoked, in the following January, Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, took occasion in his seventeenth Paschal homily to set forth the unity of Christ's Person without naming Nestorius, and to speak of the Blessed Virgin as Theotokos. To trace the history of the controversy belongs to another place. [Dict. of Sects and Heresies.] It is sufficient here to say that at the outset the intention of each party appears to have been misunderstood by the other. Cyril attributed to Nestorius a revival of the errors of Paul of Samosata, and Nestorius charged Cyril with Apollinarianism [Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vii. 32].

When the controversy had increased to such an extent as to attract the attention of the whole church, Cœlestine, the Pope, convened a council at Rome, August 11th, A.D. 430. The homilies and letters of Nestorius were then read and condemned, and the letters of Cyril approved. Cœlestine delivered an address, proving from the Fathers that the Blessed Virgin is truly Theotokos. Especially he quoted a line from the Christmas hymn of St. Ambrose, "Talis decet partus Deum," which was equivalent to the expression derided by Nestorius. The decree of the council was that those who denied this faith should be deposed from the ministry; and the Pope wrote to Cyril requesting him to act on his behalf, and requiring Nestorius to retract within ten days from the receipt of a monition. John of Antioch, wishing to act as peacemaker, endeavoured to persuade Nestorius to subscribe the term with an explanation of his meaning, but he could not be persuaded to retract what he had once advanced. He asserted his orthodoxy, and said that he had proposed Christotokos as a medium between Theotokos and Anthropotokos, and that he should appeal to a general council.

Cyril now carried out the directions of Cœlestine, by assembling a council at Alexandria in November A.D. 430. The result of this council, at which Nestorius did not appear, was a synodal letter and twelve anathematizations asserting the Divine Personality of the Incarnate Word. When the messengers from the Alexandrian Council came to Constantinople, Theodosius the Emperor, at the request both of Nestorius and his opponents, summoned the metropolitans of the empire to meet at Ephesus on Pentecost following [A.D. 437]. On the 7th of June, Cyril arrived at Ephesus, and found Nestorius awaiting his arrival. They waited for the arrival of John of Antioch, but before the opening of the council discussions between the two parties commenced. In the course of these, whilst arguing with Theodotus of Ancyra, Nestorius several times asserted, "For my part, I cannot say that a child of two or three months old was God." This was enough to disprove his fair pretensions and to expose his heresy.

On the 21st of June, a fortnight had already elapsed since the day fixed by the Emperor for the opening of the council. John of Antioch sent a message begging that, if he was delayed, Cyril would proceed with the business. The following day the council was opened, but Nestorius refused to appear. The opinions of Nestorius were condemned, and all who adhered to them deposed. The term Theotokos does not, however, occur in the Ephesine canons.

The fourth Œcumenical Council was held at Chalcedon in A.D. 451, to confute the heresy of Eutyches, who acknowledged only one nature in our Lord's Person. The synod not only expressed its adherence to the rule of faith laid down at Nicæa and confirmed at Constantinople, but it "embraced the exposition of the faith set forth at Ephesus by Cyril of blessed memory, when Nestorius was condemned," as well as "the letter addressed by the blessed and apostolic Leo, Archbishop of all the Churches, condemning the heresy of Nestorius and Eutyches." A definition of faith was also synodically set forth, in which, after the recital of the Constantinopolitan Creed, the following passages occur: "For as much as they who endeavoured to make void the preaching of the truth have by their particular heresies given rise to vain babblings, some daring to corrupt the mystery of the Lord's Incarnation for us, and refusing to the Virgin the appellation of Theotokos, . . . the present holy, great, and Œcumenical Synod has decreed that the faith of the three hundred and eighteen holy Fathers should remain free from assault." . . . "We, then, following the holy Fathers, all with one consent teach men to confess one and the same Son, our Lord Jesus Christ; the same perfect in Godhead and perfect in manhood; truly God, and truly man, of a reasonable soul and body; consubstantial with the Father according to the Godhead, and consubstantial with us according to the manhood; in all things like unto us without sin; begotten before all ages of the Father according to the Godhead, and in these latter days, for us and for our salvation, born of Mary, the Virgin Mother of God (τῆς θεότοκου), according to the manhood; one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only Begotten, to be acknowledged in two Natures, inconfusedly, unchangeably, indivisibly, inseparably, the distinction of natures being by no means taken away by the union, but rather the property of each nature being preserved, and concurring in one person and one subsistence, not parted or divided into two persons, but one and the same Son, and only begotten, God the Word, the Lord Jesus Christ, as the Prophets from the beginning have declared concerning Him, and the Lord Jesus Christ hath taught us, and the Creed of the Holy Fathers hath delivered to us."

The Council of Constantinople, held June 10th, A.D. 553, called the fifth Œcumenical Council, anathematized a letter said to be written by Ibas of Edessa to Maris the Persian, which denies that the Word was incarnate of the Holy Mother of God and ever Virgin Mary, which accuses St. Cyril of being a heretic and an Apollinarian, and which blames the Council of Ephesus for having deposed Nestorius without examination.

This title Holy Mother of God is accepted by the Church of England, inasmuch as the decrees of Ephesus, Chalcedon, and Constantinople are incorporated into her own laws. The Statute 1 Eliz. cap. i. xxxvi., A.D. 1558, provides that the commissioners appointed under that Act "shall not in any wise have authority or power to order, determine, or judge any matter or cause to be heresy, but only such as heretofore have been determined, ordered, or adjudged to be heresy by the authority of the canonical Scriptures, or by the four first general councils, or any of them." The Homily speaks of "those six councils which were allowed and received of all men." Six are mentioned here instead of four, because the fifth and sixth were virtually complements to the third and fourth.

Θεοτόκος was rendered in Latin Deipara, Genetrix Dei, and Mater Dei. Bishop Pearson considers θεοτόκος more theologically correct than Mater Dei, although the only English equivalent is Mother of God [Pearson on the Creed, ii. 145]. Amongst Anglican Divines the infrequency of this term in common use has not arisen from any bias towards Nestorianism, but from a mistaken notion that the title may imply that the Blessed Virgin Mary is something more than human. Those who fear this may remember that the discussion in its origin touched not the honour of the Mother, but the nature of her Son. There was no differenee respeeting the estimation in whieh she should be held, but the diseussion turned entirely on the person of Him Who was born of her. [Hooker, Ecc. Pol., bk. v. eh. 52. Bright's Hist. of Church, A.D. 313-451, p. 311-339. Soerates, Ecc. Hist. vii. 32, 34. Evagrius, Ecc. Hist. b. i. eh. 2-7. Bishop Forbes, Bishop Harold Browne, and Bishop Beveridge on Seeond Artiele of RELIGION.]

THOMISTS. [THEOLOGY, SCHOLASTIC.]

THURIFICATI. [LAPSED.]

TITHES. The tenth part of the produee of land, or stoek, or profits of any oeeupation, assigned for the maintenanee of the elergy and support of the Chureh. In the Law of Moses this tenth was preseribed [Numb. xviii. 21; Deut. xiv. 22; Lev. xxvii. 30]. It was elaimed by God, and by Him given to the Levites [Numb. xviii. 24]. But before this written law tithes were paid, as we know from the vow of Jaeob [Gen. xxviii. 20], and from the meeting of Abraham and Melehisedeeh [Gen. xiv.]. We find also abundant proof of heathen nations reeognising the duty of devoting a tenth to religious ends. Crœsus advised Cyrus to station guards at the gates so as to seeure the payment of tithes to Jupiter.[1] Xenophon instanees payment of tithes to Diana.[2] The Carthaginians are said to have paid tithes of all their profits.[3] The Roman generals used to devote tenths of the spoil to Hereules. Camillus, before the assault on Veii, vowed a tenth part of the spoil to the Pythian Apollo.[4] From this known praetiee of heathen nations it was held by the early Christians that the offering of a tenth of one's substanee to God was of natural right; not a merely loeal eommand to the Jews, abrogated with other parts of the ceremonial law, but of perpetual obligation. It is agreed that tithes were not recognised or regularly paid in the Christian Chureh till late in the fourth eentury. Various reasons are given for this.[5] There was a eommunity of goods, rendering tithes unneeessary and superfluous: there were no means of enforeing payment: the ruler and all the people must be Christian, to enable the Chureh to elaim them as lawful and to seeure their payment. St. Paul testifies [1 Cor. ix. 11] to the Divine right of ministers to live of the Gospel. The early Fathers wrote earnestly exhorting to the payment of tithes, and always represented them as due, not merely offered, to God.[6] Tithes were oeeasionally granted for speeial religious ends: as those given for the erusade [A.D. 1188] to King Henry II., and those given by Pope Paul III. [A.D. 1534] for the suppression of pirates at Tunis. One of the eonstitutions of Arehbishop Odo [e. A.D. 942] preseribed giving of tithes.[7] Those given before the paroehial distribution of the eountry were divided into three parts; one for the serviees of the Chureh, one for the elergy, one for the poor. But though the payment of a tenth was reeognised as a duty, the speeial person to whom it was due was not preseribed. Henee men paid to whom they would. And it was not till a deeree of Pope Celestine III. [A.D. 1195] that the payment of tithes to the clergy of the parish was rendered obligatory. But this paroehial payment was afterwards eonsidered, by those who wrote in defence of the payment, as by no means of the essenee of the obligation. So one author, in explaining his not touehing on the Jus Divinum, says, that had been done before, and he subseribes to the tenet with this distinetion, that tithes are due not to the person of one single ineumbent, but to the Church, in whose name he reeeiveth them.[8]

Tithes were distinguished as [1] personal and [2] prædial. In the first were ineluded all lawful gains in art, seienee, trade, or merehandize: in the seeond sueh as arise from the ground, as eorn, hay, fruit, inerease of eattle, fowls, &c.; but the last were sometimes eonsidered as a third sort ealled mixed tithes. Many statutes have been passed to enforee the payment of tithes. Those of 27 Hen. VIII. and 32 Hen. VIII. both referred to eeclesiastieal laws and eustoms.[9] Both these aets were eonfirmed and extended by the Statute 2 & 3 Edw. VI., and tithes payable within the last forty years were reeognised and legalized. This Aet also named in partieular (whieh had not been done before) what kinds of profits were subjeet to tithes. Upon the supposition that personal tithes were often negleeted in a man's lifetime, nearly all wills in the Middle Ages left a sum "for forgotten tithes:" and mortuaries, as Selden shews, first beeame due on this presumption. The triple division of tithes noted above beeame a quadruple one after the division of the land into fixed parishes, because the whole had formerly been under the eontrol of the bishop and his elergy, but was now administered by the parish priest. One quarter was therefore now assigned to the bishop, one to the parish priest, one to the Chureh serviees, and one to the poor. The bishop's part was soon allowed to remain unelaimed, and so at last was forbidden. Henee lay patrons, gradually inferring that one-third of the offerings was suffieient for the supply of the Chureh, first undertook to distribute the remaining two-thirds themselves, and at last in many eases seized them and appropriated them to their own uses. And when the restitution of these tithes to the Chureh took plaee, as frequently happened, it was seldom made to the parishes from whenee they were taken, but to the religious houses, to the great prejudiee of the paroehial elergy.

[1] ὡς σφεα ἀναγκαίως ἔχει δεκατευθῆναι τῷ Διΐ. Herod. i. 89; see also ix. 81.

[2] ἀεὶ δεκατεύων τὰ ἐκ τοῦ ἀγροῦ ὡραῖα. Xen. Cyropæd. v. 3, 9.

[3] εἰώθεισαν . . . δεκάτην ἀποστέλλειν τῷ θεῷ πάντων τῶν εἰς πρόσοδον πιπτόντων. Diodor. Sic. xx. 756; quoted in Hutchinson's Xenophon, p. 248, where are other authorities.

[4] Livy, v. 21, 23. There was great difficulty in discharging this vow.

[5] Bingham's Antiq. V. vi. 2.

[6] Origen, Hom. xi.; Aug. De Temp. Serm. 215: "Decimæ enim ex debito requiruntur; et qui eas dare noluerit, res alienas invasit." [Chrys. Hom. xliii. in 1 ad Cor.]

[7] "Præcipimus ut omnes studeant de omnibus quæ possideant dare decimas, quia speciale Domini Dei est."

[8] Cornelius Burges, A New Discovery of Personal Tithes, 1625.

[9] The canon on the payment of personal tithes alluded to was passed in Convocation, 23 Edw. I.

Tithes in England are divided into great and small. The former include the more important prædial tithes, as corn, &c.; and the latter the mixed and personal, together with the less valuable prædial tithes. The great tithes belong to the rector, the small tithes to the vicar. According to the terms of the original division, the small tithes were expected to amount to one-half of the great tithes. But in some parishes, from local circumstances, the small tithes are much the larger of the two. Easter offerings, which were variable, and to a certain extent capricious, were included in the small tithes. The principle of a commutation of tithes was early in practice. In some places the custom has prevailed beyond memory of paying a certain sum in money per acre instead of tithes. So certain insignificant tithes were commuted into a small annual payment called a "mayneport."[1] The recent Commutation Act was passed, 6 & 7 Will. IV., though alterations have been made in it of later date. A sum varying according to the average price of corn during seven years, ascertained from a table published by authority every January, is now paid to rectors and vicars in lieu of all tithes in kind. The object of this arrangement, and the effect, is to make tithes appear a rent-charge instead of a tax. The great or rectorial tithes have been in many places alienated, by reason of their having been seized and retained in lay hands. The vicarial tithes, in the nature of things, could not be so diverted. [Selden's History of Tithes; Kennett's Case of Impropriations.]

TOLERATION. Under the title Nonconformity have been noticed the Acts by which the State endeavoured to retain the whole people within the bounds of the National Church. We shall here [1] notice the changes introduced into English law by the Act of Toleration, and subsequent Acts of a like nature, down to the repeal of the Test Act in 1828; and [2] guided by the principles of these Acts, but not being theoretically bound by them, we shall state in general the nature of religious toleration.

I. The Toleration Act [1 Will. and Mary, c. 18] frees from the penalties of Nonconformity those who take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and who subscribe the declaration against popery of 30 Car. II. ii. c. 1, reserving in force 25 Car. II. c. 2 and 13 Car. II. c. 1, the Acts, that is, for preventing dangers which may happen from popish recusants, and for preserving the king's person and government by disabling papists from sitting in Parliament. Assemblies for religious worship are to be with open doors. Nonconformists are not exempt from tithes or Church dues, or from prosecutions to enforce such payments. Dissenters scrupling the oaths of office of high constable, petit constable, or any parochial office, may execute such office by deputy. Preachers taking the oaths and subscribing the declaration before named, and subscribing the Articles of Religion, except XXXIV. XXXV. XXXVI. and the clause of XX. regarding the power and authority of the Church, are freed from the penalties of the Acts of Nonconformity, and Baptist preachers are excused the part of Art. XXVII. touching infant baptism. Such preachers are exempt from serving on juries, and from offices in parishes and hundreds. Quakers, upon making a declaration of fidelity and subscribing a profession of Christian belief, are exempted from the oaths, and enjoy the privileges of other dissenters. The laws for frequenting Divine service on the Lord's day are in force against those who do not attend some permitted place of worship. The Act does not extend to those who deny the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. Penalties are laid on disturbers of public worship, whether in church or conventicle. Places of dissenting worship are to be certified and registered.

By the 19 Geo. III. c. 44, Protestant dissenting ministers and schoolmasters are exempted from the subscription to the Articles on making and subscribing a declaration that the Scriptures contain the revealed will of God, and are received as the rule of doctrine and practice. By the 53 Geo. III. c. 106, the provisions of the Act of Will. and Mary, also those of 9 & 10 Will. III., respecting the denial of the Trinity, were repealed, the common law with respect to impugning the doctrine of the Trinity not being altered. [See Phillimore's Burn, ii. p. 320, e.]

By the 52 Geo. III. c. 155, the Five-mile and Conventicle Acts, and an act relating to Quakers [13 & 14 Car. II. c. 1], are repealed: all religious assemblies of fewer than twenty persons become lawful without registration, those of more than twenty persons are to be registered and certified: it is made penal to preach in a house without consent of the occupier (before this enactment it was actionable at common law): all, whether teachers or hearers, attending a certified place of worship are as exempt from all penalties as any person who shall have taken the oaths and made the declaration prescribed in the Toleration Act: preachers not engaged in any secular employment except that of schoolmaster are exempt from the civil services mentioned in the Toleration Act, and from serving in the militia: a penalty of £40 is laid on those who disturb any congregation assembled for worship.

By the 9 Geo. IV. c. 17, the Test and Corporation Acts are repealed, and a declaration substituted in lieu of the sacramental test. Before this an annual bill of indemnity had rendered the Test Act almost inoperative.

II. It has been observed that the century before the Revolution was marked by the attempt to retain the highest notion of Church and State; the identity, that is, of the two bodies. Statesmen and philosophers have continued to assert this identity in theory. Burke wrote, "In a Christian commonwealth the Church and State are one and the same thing, being different integral parts of the same whole." The same idea runs through Coleridge's Church and State. Mr. Gladstone wrote regarding his treatise, The State in Relation with the Church, "Undoubtedly I should speak of the pure abstract idea of Church and State as implying that they are co-extensive" [Chapter of Autobiography, p. 16].

[1] Derived from "in manu portatum." It was usually paid in bread. In a tithe-book from 1608 to 1632 still preserved at Paston, Northants, this payment averaged twopence a house at Easter. A proprietor who owned a number of animals, as lambs, not an exact multiple of ten, would "run on;" that is, carry on the overplus to the next Easter account.

In that century the clerisy or spirituality held the position described in the preamble of the well-known Statute of Appeals. They were a great venerable estate of the realm: and the theory of government was that the first object of a government is not the carrying out maxims of political economy, but principally the moral welfare of the community over which it is set: that morality can be efficiently furthered only through religion: that religion can be inculcated only through the organization of a Church. Upon these principles the State proceeded from the Reformation to the Revolution; the Nonconformists not advocating toleration, but endeavouring to substitute their own platform for the order of the Church. And so long as there was a reasonable chance of realizing the ideal of the identity of the Church and State temporal penalties upon nonconformity were in principle justifiable. They were not breaches by the Church of the canon of Toledo, "Præcipit S. Synodus nemini deinceps ad credendum vim inferre," nor of Tertullian's maxim, "Lex nova non se vindicat ultore gladio;" they were the discipline of the commonwealth, designed to maintain its acknowledged status, and comparable to the discipline of a family or college which trains up its members in an established rule. Whether the attempt was persevered in too long, whether the penalties from other causes degenerated into persecution, is a distinct question. [Persecution.] At the Revolution it was evident to all that the ideal aimed at was unattainable. A change of dynasty introduced toleration.

The state of toleration is intermediate between the state which has been described and the state of perfect equality and indifferentism, equality of all religious bodies and creeds, indifferentism of the government to all forms. The name toleration implies an endeavour to maintain an established Church, but to inflict no temporal penalties on nonconformity.

To grant or to withhold toleration belongs to the State.[1] The duties and principles of the Church as a spiritual body are abundantly clear. The weapons of her warfare are spiritual: and if by toleration is meant immunity from temporal penalties, the Church can become intolerant only by deserting her principles. But she is also a zealous and watchful guardian of the truth; and if by toleration be meant bearing with error by abstaining from spiritual censures, then she can be tolerant only by renouncing her fidelity. The Church has "non ubera solum sed verbera."

[1] See Art. XXXIV.: "Whosoever through his private judgment . . . doth break the traditions and ceremonies of the Church . . . ought to be rebuked openly . . . as he that offendeth against the common order of the Church, and hurteth the authority of the magistrate." It rests with the magistrate to vindicate his authority in his own way; or to withdraw his command.

When the State then has relinquished its highest ground it cannot stop short of giving full liberty to every shade of religious opinion and every form of worship. Thus the attempt to retain a penalty for the denial of the Trinity was soon abandoned.

The case of the Romanists is a mixed case; it involves the introduction of a foreign jurisdiction into Church and State, and as is contrary to the maxims of the one as it is to those of the other.

Again, relinquishing its highest ground, the State can no longer set up a standard of Christian morality; it cannot go beyond civil and political ethics. It repudiates the theory that all its members are Christians; it cannot consistently, therefore, require of them that degree of morality which is peculiar to Christianity. Certain offences also, which before were treated as offences against God and His religion, can now be treated only as offences against man. E.g., blasphemy becomes only a breach of the laws of good neighbourhood, such an offence as it would be at Mecca to revile Mahomet. The whole course of legislation since 1689 shews that however reluctant the legislature may have been to admit the conclusions of the principles of toleration, those conclusions are in fact inevitable. [See Locke's Statement of the Duties of Toleration.] Reference is made to this well-known author in order to mark a point in which he has not expressed himself with sufficient clearness. He states the duties of toleration as pertaining properly to the Church, "No Church-officer shall punish another man," &c. It was statute law, not Church law, that was repealed in order to introduce toleration. No doubt there have been persecuting bishops; but the High Commission Court and the Star Chamber were not Church courts: they were Committees of the Privy Council.

In one very important particular, that of public education, the true principles of toleration were not applied, and of late years they have in great measure been supplanted by the principle of indifferentism. Combining the principle that the State ought to inculcate as high a morality as the nation will bear, with the principle that it tolerates other religious bodies as well as the Established Church, there results, as the leading principle of education, that the State should acknowledge as agents of education those religious bodies which possess sufficient truth for the establishment of a morality, sound as far as it reaches; and should require such truth and such morality to be inculcated. Instead of this, late years have seen the Government of England aiding in the establishment of public schools from which all religious teaching is excluded. This appearance of indifferentism or practical infidelity leads us to the consideration whether toleration must not inevitably lead to this terminus.

Toleration, giving up all temporal penalties on nonconformity, still endeavours to maintain an Established Church. This confers certain privileges on the members of the Church, and imposes certain disqualifications on Nonconformists. The necessity that great officers of State should be of the Established Church, that none others should be members of the legislature, that bishops should have seats in the House of Lords, that the synods of the Church should be in formal connection with Parliament, that the clergy should be distinguished by certain privileges, these points are all allowed or presupposed in the Toleration Acts. With regard to the political privileges of the laity, it is not easy, if possible, to establish and maintain a distinction between the inflicting of temporal penalties and the imposing disqualifications, so as to shew the rightfulness of abstaining from the former and adhering to the latter. It is not easy to say why a form of worship should be tolerated, and those who follow it be debarred from seats in the councils of the nation. This feeling has prevailed so far, that one disqualification after another has been removed; and toleration is fast passing into another stage, of perfect equality or of indifferentism on the part of the Government.

Again, with regard to the privileges of the clergy—when the principle that the Church and nation are one is surrendered, these privileges can only be granted by the State on the condition of the surrender of the Church's freedom. While the Church and State are co-extensive they may work harmoniously together; when there are many religious bodies tolerated one can be distinguished above others only when its laws are subjected to the approval of the State, that is, to the approval of a legislature which includes opponents of that one body. Thus the validity of a marriage by a priest of the Church of England without the presence of a civil officer cannot coexist together with such unlimited freedom in the appointment of bishops and priests as is enjoyed by dissenting bodies in the appointment of their ministers.

From these premisses we arrive at the following conclusions; that the state of toleration is only a transitional state between a true national church and the indifferentism of many religious bodies politically equal; that the principle of toleration once admitted will inevitably overcome the defences by which it is sought to maintain an Established Church; that such an Established Church exists—her opponents being admitted as judges—only "durante bene placito" or "quamdiu se bene gesserit;" that the privileges she is allowed imply a corresponding surrender of freedom; that the Erastianism so engendered may compel a church to seek freedom in disestablishment, or to seek the support of an external spiritual power; to become, that is, a "free church" or to submit to Rome, a choice which presents no difficulty to those who are aware of the evils which have attended the elevation of the Bishop of Rome to be the head and centre of Christendom.

TRADITION. [Consent of Antiquity. Rule of Faith. Paschal Controversy.]

TRADITORES. [Lapsed.]

TRADUCIANISM. Ex seminis traduce, an opinion first proposed by Tertullian, and maintained by some writers in subsequent ages of the Church—that the soul of a child is not immediately created by God, but is derived by propagation together with the body from its parents. [Creationism.]

TRANSFIGURATION. The transfiguration of our Lord took place in the third year of His ministry, very soon after the great confession of St. Peter, and the first announcement of His coming passion.

I. The narrative is given in all the Synoptic Gospels, with a few slight variations as to details in each. Six days, or as St. Luke says, "about an eight days," after the sayings which followed upon St. Peter's confession, our Lord took Peter, James, and John "up into a high mountain apart by themselves." Ancient commentators were agreed in thinking that this mountain was Mount Tabor, which is described as "standing by itself, about two or three furlongs within the plain of Esdraelon," but later criticism has rejected this conclusion, and has fixed the locality, with some hesitation, "on one of the lofty spurs of the snow-capped Hermon" [Ellicott, after Lightfoot]. Here, as He prayed, our Lord was transfigured (μετεμορφώθη) before the three disciples. "The fashion of His countenance was altered," "His face shone as the sun;" "His raiment was white and glistering." Then appeared Moses and Elias talking with Him, the subject of their conversation being, as St. Luke says, "His decease which He should accomplish at Jerusalem." The disciples, at first heavy with sleep, awake to see His glory and the two standing with Him. St. Peter, entranced by the vision, prays that they may make three tabernacles and there abide. But as he speaks, a cloud overshadows them, and the voice of God is heard repeating once more the words spoken over our Lord at His baptism, "This is my beloved Son," and adding other words with a special meaning of their own, "hear Him." Then the cloud passes away; Jesus, left alone, lifts up His terrified disciples, and bids them tell no man what they have seen till after His resurrection.

II. The significance of this event has been variously interpreted. According to St. Leo, its general purpose was to remove the scandal of the Cross, and to foreshadow the glorious change which awaits the whole Body of Christ at the general resurrection. Again, it has been thought to be meant as a proof of the divinity of our Lord, hidden and shrouded to human eyes in His Humanity. The same glory, according to St. Thomas, might have shone forth during the whole of His earthly life, had He not willed otherwise. Olshausen gives two other interpretations of its meaning and purpose. [1] That it was the installation of our Lord as the spiritual lawgiver; [2] that it was part of His advancement to perfection. In the first sense, he regards it as typified by the ascent of Moses on to Mount Sinai with Nadab and Abihu, when God "called unto Moses out of the midst of the cloud" [Exod. xxiv.]. For the second, he refers to Heb. ii. 10, "It became Him, for Whom are all things, and by Whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings."

To pass from the significance of the event generally to that of its particular parts, we may notice as to the choice of the three Apostles out of the whole number, that it was in accordance with our Lord's custom on other great occasions, notably at the time of the Agony of the Garden. The Fathers see in it the fulfilment of our Lord's promise given just before, "There be some standing here," &c., and they remark a special fitness in the fact, that those who were the closest eye-witnesses of His sufferings were prepared for them by the sight of His glory. Others have seen a mystical signification in the choice. Thus St. Peter would denote men of courage and constancy; St. John, men of chastity; St. James, those who uproot and conquer vices; or again, in St. Peter would be seen a firm faith; in St. James, a lofty hope; in St. John, a burning love. In this way St. Anselm turns the whole into a practical exhortation to prepare for the sight of God by the practice of these virtues. For the appearance of Moses and Elias, as the witnesses of this glory, many reasons have been assigned. St. Thomas Aquinas, following St. Chrysostom, gives six: [1] because the multitude had said that He was Elias; [2] because Moses gave the Law, and Elias was zealous toward God. Their joint testimony, therefore, would repel the common calumnies, that He broke the Law, and that He assumed to Himself unwarrantably the glory of God. [3] To shew that He had power over life and death, and was the Judge both of quick and dead. Moses had died the death of man, Elias had been translated without death, yet both appeared to bear witness to the Lord of life. [4] "They talked of His decease," they, that is, who had themselves exposed themselves to the peril of death; [5] that the disciples might be led to strive after the meekness of Moses, and the zeal of Elias; [6] to shew that He was foretold both by the Law and the Prophets, that He was the Messiah promised by both. The cloud was at once the symbol and veil of the glory of God. It was "bright," because it was the index of the glory of Christ, and also that it might contrast with the darkness of that which overshadowed Mount Sinai [Heb. xii. 18; Exod. xix. 16-18], and thus shew the difference between the Old and New Covenants. The voice from heaven was a second divine witness to the Incarnation, and the words now added, "Hear Him," fulfilled the prophecy of Moses, "A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you like unto me," claiming credence for Him "Whom the mysteries of the Law foretold and the mouths of the Prophets sang."

Blending together the various interpretations, we may say that, theologically, the Transfiguration was meant to teach that the Law and the Prophets were now one in Christ, and that, morally, it was intended to strengthen the faith of the Apostles in our Lord's Divinity, to prepare them for the Agony and the Cross, to shew them the glory of the future, and make them the more ready to receive the rule of Christian practice laid down immediately after, "If any one will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Me." As to the mode of the Transfiguration, it will be sufficient to say, with ancient writers, that the glory was not the manifestation of the Divinity, which is reserved for the Beatific Vision of Heaven, and is not to be seen by mortal men. It was rather that external glory of the Sacred Body which was the index of the Divinity. Moreover, as is clear from the narrative, there was no change of the reality or shape of our Lord's countenance. The event is only once mentioned in the later books of the New Testament, viz., in St. Peter's second epistle [ii. 16-18], where he appeals to the sight of His majesty, and to the "voice from the excellent glory," as proofs that he and his fellow Apostles were following the truth and not cunningly devised fables.

III. The festival of the Transfiguration was kept in the Western Church in the time of St. Leo, and in the Greek Church about A.D. 700. By a bull of Calixtus III., A.D. 1457, it was ordered to be generally observed to commemorate the deliverance of Belgrade from Mahomet the Second. In the English Calendar it stands at the 6th of August. [St. Augustine, Serm. lxxviii. vol. v. p. 425, sqq. ed. Bened. St. Chrysostom, in Matth. Hom. lvi. vol. vii. p. 569, ed. Bened. St. Thomas Aquinas, Summ. Theol. p. iii. qu. 45. St. Leo Magn., Serm. li. aliter xciv. Olshausen on St. Matthew. Wordsworth, Gr. Test. Ellicott, Huls. Lect. p. 226-7. Williams, The Ministry, p. 84, sqq. Annotated Book of Common Prayer, Minor Holy-days.]

TRANSMIGRATION. [METEMPSYCHOSIS.]

TRANSUBSTANTIATION. A term of Scholastic Theology, intended to express the nature and extent of the change which takes place in the elements of Bread and Wine at the celebration of the Holy Eucharist.

I. HISTORY OF THE TERM. The introduction of the word Transubstantiation into the theology of the Church is traceable to the eleventh century. It is first found in an exposition of the canon of the Mass by Peter Damian [A.D. 988-1072], who writes as follows, "Hoc est corpus meum. Quæritur quid demonstret sacerdos per hoc prænomen hoc? Si panem, pani nunquam congruit esse corpus Christi. Sed demonstrat corpus Christi; sed quando profertur ipsum pronomen, nondum est transubstantiatio" [Peter Damian, Expositio Can. Miss. cap. vii.; Maii Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. VI. ii. 215]. Although the words shew that the term was not altogether unknown when it was thus used, it is not found again until the following century, when it occurs twice in a treatise on the Sacrament of the Altar by Stephen, Bishop of Autun [A.D. 1113-1129]. The first time he writes, "Oramus ut cibus hominum fiat cibus Angelorum, scilicet ut oblatio panis et vini transubstantietur in corpus et sanguinem Jesu Christi." The second passages in which he uses the word is as follows, "Item si benedictione sua panem in corpus suum convertit in verbis istis: Hoc est corpus meum, non reliquit nobis virtutem Sacramenti: quia priusquam hæc verba diceret; benedixit, fregit, et dans discipulis, prædicta verba protulit: eis dans virtutem Sacramenti, quasi diceret, Panem quem accepi, in corpus meum transubstantiavi, et illud do vobis" [Stephen of Autun, De Sacram. Altaris, cap. xiii., xiv.; Biblioth. Patr. Lugd. xx., 1878, 1879].

Later on, in the twelfth century, the term was beginning to come into a less rare use, as is shewn by quotations given in Tournely's Prælect. Theolog. v. 256; De Euch. qu. iii. art. 1. Its first appearance as a term, accepted and recognised by the Church, is in the first of the seventy Constitutions presented to the fourth Council of Lateran [A.D. 1215] by Innocent III., and tacitly adopted by that Council. "Una est fidelium universalis Ecclesia, extra quam nullus omnino salvatur. In qua idem ipse sacerdos est sacrificium Jesus Christus, cujus corpus et sanguis in sacramento altaris sub speciebus panis et vini veraciter continentur, transsubstantiatis pane in corpus et vino in sanguinem, potestate Divina, ut ad perficiendum mysterium unitatis accipiamus ipsi de suo, quod accepit ipse de nostro" [IV. Conc. Lat. cap. i.]. Nearly three centuries and a half later [A.D. 1551] the Council of Trent set forth the existing Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation. "Quoniam autem Christus, Redemptor noster, corpus suum id, quod sub specie panis offerebat, vere esse dixit; ideo persuasum semper in Ecclesia Dei fuit, idque nunc denuo sancta hæc synodus declarat, per consecrationem panis et vini conversionem fieri totius substantiæ panis in substantiam corporis Christi Domini nostri, et totius substantiæ vini in substantiam sanguinis ejus; quæ conversio convenienter et proprie a sancta Catholica Ecclesia Transubstantiatio est appellata" [Conc. Trident. sess. xiii. cap. iv.]. This definition was fortified by an anathema in the second Canon on the Eucharist, passed at the same session, in which the annihilation of the natural elements is made part of the doctrine of Transubstantiation. "Si quis dixerit in sacrosancto Eucharistiæ sacramento remanere substantiam panis et vini una cum corpore et sanguine Domini nostri Jesu Christi; negaveritque mirabilem illam et singularem conversionem totius substantiæ panis in corpus, et totius substantiæ vini in sanguinem, manentibus dumtaxat speciebus panis et vini, quam quidem conversionem Catholica Ecclesia aptissime Transubstantiationem appellat, Anathema sit" [Ibid., De Sacrosanct. Euch. Sacr. can. i.].

The term thus adopted by the Latin portion of the Western Church has its counterpart in the Eastern Church in the term Μετουσίωσις. This was formally adopted in the "Orthodox Confession of Faith of the Catholic and Apostolic Church of the East" [A.D. 1643], and in Article XVII. of the Council of Bethlehem, or of Jerusalem [A.D. 1672]. In the first of these, which is the standard of Eastern doctrine, after mentioning the Ascension of our Lord, it is added that, "He is also present upon earth in a sacramental manner (κατὰ τὸν μυστηριώδη τρόπον) by transubstantiation (κατὰ μετουσίωσιν), since the substance (οὐσία) of the bread is changed into the substance of His holy Body, and the substance of the wine into the substance of His precious Blood" [Quæstio lvi.]. In the seventeenth canon of the council, it is said, that, "after consecration the Bread and wine are transmuted, transubstantiated, converted, transformed (μεταβάλλεσθαι, μετουσιοῦσθαι, μεταποιεῖσθαι, μεταῤῥυθμίζεσθαι), the bread into the Lord's Body which was born at Bethlehem and ascended to heaven, and the wine into the Blood which flowed from His side on the Cross; and that the bread and wine no longer remain after consecration, but only the very Body and Blood of the Lord (αὐτὸ τὸ σῶμα καὶ τὸ αἷμα), under the appearance (εἴδει) and form (τύπῳ), that is to say, under the accidents (συμβεβηκόσιν) of bread, and that the Body and Blood of Christ are received into the mouth and stomach of the evil and the faithful, but that the accidents only are broken, Christ being wholly and ever under each portion." It is added, "that by the word Transubstantiation we cannot explain the mode of the conversion of the elements, for this is known to God only—but as signifying that truly, really, and substantially they become the Body and Blood of Christ." This confession of faith, which had an especial reference to the Lutheran doctrine of the Eucharist, was, as Dr. Neale says, "slightly tinged with Latinism." In the version of the Council, as received by the Russian Church, a few alterations were made:—instead of "the substance of bread and wine no longer remain," it is said "the bread and wine no longer remain:" instead of "under the accidents of bread," we find under "the appearance and form" of bread and wine. "The Russian Church has evidently," says Dr. Neale, "determined to decline the use or the distinction of the οὐσία and βεβηκότα of the bread and wine, which the Council of Bethlehem brought prominently forward" [Neale's Hist. East. Ch., introd. p. 1174].

The Church of England never adopted the word "Transubstantiation" in any formal document; and at the same time that the Council of Trent was fixing it upon the Latin Church, the sacred Synod of the English Church was declaring in the twenty-eighth Article of Religion, "Panis et vini Transubstantiatio in Eucharistia, ex sacris literis probari non potest, sed apertis Scripturæ verbis adversatur et multarum superstitionum dedit occasionem" [Art. XXVIII., A.D. 1552]. To this was added (after "adversatur") in A.D. 1571, "sacramenti naturam evertit:" and this portion of the Twenty-eighth Article of Religion now stands in English in the following form, "Transubstantiation (or the change of the substance of bread and wine) in the Supper of the Lord, cannot be proved by Holy Writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a Sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions" [Art. XXVIII., A.D. 1571]. It is to be observed that the English form of this Article, as set forth in A.D. 1552, was corrupted by the definition of Transubstantiation as "the change of the substance of bread and wine into the substance of Christ's Body and Blood." The careful omission of the interpolated words in the existing English form of the Article shews that the phrase "change of substance" looks to the Roman doctrine enunciated by the Council of Trent, in which the substance of bread and wine is said to be so changed that it no longer exists in the sacramental elements. That the Body and Blood of Christ exist in those elements is as much the belief of the English Church as of the Latin and Greek Churches.

II. Controversy respecting Transubstantiation. The divergence of opinion respecting the doctrine of Transubstantiation will be here referred to only as regards the Tridentine interpretation of it, which declares that the substance of bread and wine no longer remains after that bread and wine are changed into the substance of Christ's Body and Blood.

1. No controversy on the subject arose in the early Church, and therefore no exact statement as to the nature and extent of the change effected by consecration is to be expected. But that a change does take place is asserted and taken for granted (as admitting of no dispute) from the first. The Liturgies and Fathers universally indicate the belief of the Church that by consecration the substances of bread and wine become, or are made, the Body and Blood of the Lord. Thus Irenæus says that it (the broken bread and mingled cup) becometh (γίνεται) the Eucharist of the Body of the Lord. St. Ambrose, that the bread is made (fit) the Flesh of Christ, and St. Chrysostom, that the oblations become (γενέσθαι) the Body and Bood of Christ. But the Fathers also declare, under varied forms of expression, that the bread and wine are changed into the Body and Blood of Christ. Thus St. Ambrose says, "Shall not Christ's word avail to change (mutet) the elements—to change that which was into what it was not." He also compares the sacramental mutation to the change of Moses' rod into a serpent, to the change of the water of the Nile into blood; and St. Cyril of Jerusalem, to the change of water into wine in the miracle of Cana. St. Gregory of Nyssa speaks of the Bread being transmuted (μεταποιεῖσθαι); and St. Chrysostom of its being converted (μετασκευάζων), transformed (μεταῤῥυθμίζει); and St. Cyril of Alexandria and St. Gregory Nyssa of its being trans-elemented (μεταστοιχοιῶσας) into the Lord's Body. St. John Damascene sums up the teaching of the Greek Fathers, that the elements are supernaturally transmuted (ὑπερφυῶς μεταποιοῦνται) into the Body and Blood of Christ.

The language of the early Liturgies is in agreement with that of the Fathers. Thus, in the Liturgies of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil, we read in the invocation, "changing them by Thy Spirit," and in the Æthiopian Liturgy that "He (Holy Spirit) may make the bread the Body of Christ," and in the Liturgy of Jerusalem, "that the Holy Ghost may sanctify and make the bread the Holy Body of Thy Christ." Even stronger language is used in the Mozarabic and Gallican Liturgies. In the Mozarabic Missal, "bread is changed into flesh, and wine transformed into blood:" and in Gallican Liturgies the elements are said to be "transformed into the Sacrament of His Body and Blood;" the Holy Spirit "converts wine into blood;" "wine is changed into the Blood and bread into the Body of Christ." Further: not only a real sacramental change is indicated under various phrases and expressions, but sometimes (though rarely) a change of the substance of the bread and wine. Thus St. Cæsarius of Arles [A.D. 502] says, that "the invisible High Priest changes visible creatures into the substance of His Body and Blood." Alcuin, the disciple of Bede, also says, that "bread and wine are consecrated into the substance of the Body and Blood of Christ." [Eucharist, Grace of.]

Now, it is manifest from these quotations that "substance" and similar words were not used in the early Church in a strictly defined sense, according to a theory prevalent in the Middle Ages, but loosely and popularly, of anything considered per se, or in its entirety. Thus stone might be said to be a hard and wax of a soft "substance." "Substance" had then no peculiar or clearly defined sense, because other and very different terms are used as being of identical meaning. Thus St. Ambrose speaks of the "nature" and "species" of the elements being changed. By "species" he could not have meant the outward form or appearance which are not changed, but in a certain sense the bread itself: his terms at least are irreconcileable with the mediæval theory, according to which the species remain unchanged. The "substance," "nature," "species," of the elements are said to be changed by consecration to show the reality of the Eucharistic transformation, that it is not to be understood figuratively, but in very truth.

The fact is, that the precise effect of the mysterious Eucharistic change, not being a matter of controversy in the early Church, and the question being vindicated by apostolic tradition, the language of the Fathers on the subject is not strictly uniform. Thus, some of the Fathers, if their words are literally interpreted, represent the supernatural change as being destructive of the outward elements. As St. Cyril of Jerusalem—"That what seems bread is not bread though the sense will have it so," and that wine "is changed into blood" as water into wine in the miracle of Cana. The comparisons of St. Ambrose, as of the change of Moses' rod into a serpent, lead to the supposition that he held a similar view. On the other hand, St. Irenæus tells us that the Eucharist consists of two things, an earthly and a heavenly (thing), and Theodoret, that the symbols remain in their former "substance, and figure, and form." The discrepancies indicated shew the absence in the early Church of definite and universally received teaching on the state after consecration of the Eucharistic symbols;—perhaps the question might be considered as comparatively unimportant, or that a precise or exact definition was impossible. The doctrine of the Real Presence was unanimously taught: other questions were practically regarded as unimportant, and, however decided, as not trenching upon this fundamental verity. Thus Theodoret, who states most expressly the existence of the outward symbols, yet adds, they are believed to be what they are called, Christ's Body and Blood, and are worshipped.

2. The definition of the Eucharistic change of substance which was adopted by the fourth Council of Lateran, and which has been previously quoted, was the result of a long controversy which began in the ninth century, when Paschasius Radbertus [d. A.D. 865] attempted to define its nature and extent, and maintained the non-existence of the bread and wine after consecration. This controversy culminated in the reaction represented by Berengarius [A.D. 1047-1088], who was believed to deny the Real Presence altogether, but respecting whose opinions there is some uncertainty. [Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES, &c.]

It has already been shewn that it was during the time of this controversy the term Transubstantiation gradually came into use. As to the word itself, the introduction of a new term, defining unambiguously the Real Presence, might have been required by the circumstances of the Church, just as the term Homoousian in the fourth century to express the Catholic doctrine of our Lord's Divinity. But unhappily the new word implied, or was explained as implying, the Aristotelian theory of substance and outward phenomena or accidents, and thus to the definition of the doctrine of the Real Presence was annexed a metaphysical theory, which became its authorized exponent. Besides the word "substance" is, in itself, indefinite; and hence it has become a fruitful source of misunderstanding and error. Controversial writers sometimes use the word, since the Council of Trent, according to its scholastic meaning, whilst others, forgetting that definition, employ it in the ordinary or popular sense.

Thus Roman Catholic writers often speak of the bread and wine after consecration as non-existing, and call them "appearances,"—a word which really sets aside the doctrine generally, at least, held by the Church of Rome, and certainly expressly taught by the Catechism of the Council of Trent,[1] and could only have been used by mistaking or confusing the words "substance" and "accidents,"—just as if by consecration the bread and wine had ceased to exist, and nothing remained but this outward form or appearance. But this is not the case according to the scholastic theory:—according to this, the substance, no longer existing, is an inward and invisible thing which cannot possibly come under the cognizance of the senses, all the outward phenomena remaining as before as in bread—whiteness, taste, bulk, nourishing properties, &c. Hence St. Thomas Aquinas[2] speaks of the outward sign after consecration being broken, and that under each fragment is contained the whole Body of Christ. But it would be obviously absurd to speak of breaking into pieces a thing which had no real existence, a non-ens, or "species," or, in English phrase, mere "appearances."

But the real objection against the Roman Catholic doctrine, as commonly and popularly understood, does not principally arise from misconception of its meaning, and from the contradictions which seem to follow, as e.g. that accidents (appearances) have the power of nourishing, but rather from the carnal or material sense in which the doctrine has been generally held or explained.

We have ample proof that a gross and material view of the Real Presence was taught in the eighth and ninth centuries, in the Middle Ages, and at the period of the Reformation. Dr. Rock, in his account of the teaching on the Holy Eucharist in the Anglo-Saxon Church, narrates many miraculous appearances of our Lord—as to Plecgils, a priest who lived in the middle of the fifth century, to whom our Lord manifested Himself under the form of a child: to Odo, Archbishop of Canterbury, who, breaking the Host, drops of blood flowed: to Arsenius, who consecrated and a child was seen on the altar, whom an angel cut in pieces, giving Arsenius a portion of the blood-stained flesh: to a woman who, receiving the Eucharistic Bread from St. Gregory the Great, smiled incredulously when it was called the Body of Christ: taking it from her, he placed it upon the altar, and at his prayer it was changed into a blood-stained finger. Dr. Rock quotes Ælfric's homilies, where we find the story of St. Gregory just related. Also a story of two monks who prayed to God for some manifestation concerning the holy housel;[3] and after prayer assisted at mass. "Then saw they a child lying on the altar, at which the mass priest was celebrating mass; and God's angel stood with a hand knife waiting until the priest should break the housel. The angel then dismembered the child in the dish and poured the blood into the cup. Afterwards, when they went to the housel, it was changed into bread and wine." Dr. Rock relates these accounts from Ælfric as a proof that he (Ælfric) believed that Christ was present "in a real bodily way." And though Dr. Rock himself admits that Christ's Body is now only present in the Eucharist in a glorified state, it by no means follows that such was the teaching of writers of the Anglo-Saxon Church.[4]

But let us now go on to consider the prevailing belief on the Eucharistic Presence of the period of the Reformation. In the examination of one of the martyrs, this very question was brought for-

[1] In the quotations already given from the Council of Trent, the whole substance of the bread is said to be changed into the Body of Christ, the "species" only remaining. Those words do not necessarily imply the scholastic theory, and probably admit a patristic and Catholic interpretation: but in the Catechism of the Council the mediæval theory is undoubtedly asserted or implied. The bread and wine, when consecrated, are said to be "without a subject,"—"in a manner altogether superior to the order of nature, they subsist of themselves, entering in no subject." [Part ii. quest. 43.]

[2] "In festo Corporis Christi" [Missale].

[3] This word, called also husel or husle, and which appears in the Mœso-Gothic version of the Bible made by Ulphilas about the year A.D. 370, under the form of huusle, means "victim or sacrifice." [Dr. Lingard, Anglo-Saxon Church, vol. i. 325.]

[4] Church of our Fathers, vol. i. p. 19, &c., ed. 1849.

ward, as to whether the Eucharistic presence was that of our Lord's actual Body as on earth, or of His spiritual or glorified Body. In his examination of John Bland, Harpsfield, Bonner's chaplain, represents the Eucharistic Presence as that of our Lord's glorified Body. He says, "The natural Body of Christ that was born of the Virgin is glorified, and that same Body is in the Sacrament after consecration." Bland replies, "I would that all men heard that ye say the glorified Body of Christ is in the sacrament after the consecration." Harpsfield repeats and vindicates his assertion, but the prisoner is still unconvinced—startled and surprised at a strange unheard-of theory. "This methinks," he says, "is new doctrine."[1]

It cannot be doubted that in the Anglo-Saxon Church, and at the period of the Reformation, it was generally and popularly believed that ordinary human flesh and blood were received in the Blessed Mysteries, and that the sight of them was miraculously withheld from the senses. The supernatural narratives quoted by Dr. Rock do not, it should be borne in mind, in any degree illustrate the true doctrine of the Real Presence. The Church believes that the whole Body of Christ is present under each portion of the broken species;[2] the sight therefore of a piece of blood-stained flesh, or of a bloody finger, would implicitly, at least, be contradictory to its teaching, and have a tendency to confirm the gross error of the men of Capernaum, that Christ was received and eaten by carnal manducation. It would be, indeed, irreverent and presumptuous to determine the mode in which the Eucharistic Presence may sometimes have been manifested either to confirm the faith of God's true servants, or to convince the incredulous: the narratives before us are neither in themselves probable, nor do they appear to rest on unexceptionable and credible testimony. In our Lord's miraculous appearances in the Eucharist, which we read of in the Primitive Church, to which Dr. Rock refers,[3] there are none which in the least degree resemble the Anglo-Saxon miracles. Besides, carnal manducation is per se incredible and impossible. Christ's Body is now spiritual (σῶμα πνευματίκον) impassible, and no longer subject to the conditions of its earthly state; and the mode in which it is eaten, and becomes our spiritual food, is inconceivable:—beyond words or thought. We only know—and the knowledge is all-sufficient—that He feeds us in a manner ineffable, with the same flesh and blood that He received from His Virgin mother, and that thus partaking of His very nature we become one with Him and He with us.

That the popular idea of Transubstantiation has led to superstition there can be no doubt, and it is for ever to be regretted that the minute definitions of Roman theologians should have been carried to such an extravagant extent as to encourage that popular idea. Yet it is difficult to understand why the term itself should have given rise to so much bitter controversy. Perhaps the true explanation is that, on both sides controversialists have made it a test-term for belief in the Eucharistic Presence of Christ. Many Protestants have been unable to see anything but the popular idea of Transubstantiation in such a belief, and many Romanists have been unable to see that such a belief can be held without acknowledging the truth of even the theological view of Transubstantiation. As far as the formularies and expressed belief of the Churches of England and Rome are concerned, they are entirely at one in believing that our Lord's Body and Blood are truly present in the Eucharist; and under such circumstances a philosophical definition as to the mode of that Presence should never have had any influence in interrupting their external communion.

TRINE BAPTISM. A mode of administering the Sacrament, which was so universal in the Primitive Church that there can be no doubt it was derived from apostolic tradition. The person baptized was thrice immersed, or water was thrice poured on him in the Name of the Three Persons of the Godhead. The reason of Trine Baptism was manifest: the three immersions shewed the distinction of the Three Divine Persons, although the baptism was only one—in the Name of the undivided Godhead—"one baptism for the remission of sins." Thus in baptism the unity of the Divine Nature and the distinction of the Three Persons are clearly implied and set forth; and it is a remarkable fact that the first person who altered the Apostolic usage was Eunomius, the Arian heretic, who baptized with one immersion. Trine Baptism was enjoined by the fiftieth of the Apostolical Canons, the bishop or presbyter who baptized with one immersion being ordered to be deposed; and it is often mentioned by Latin and Greek Fathers as the ordinary rule or usage of the Church.

In the sixth and seventh centuries one immersion in baptism was substituted by some in Spain for the ordinary rule of the Church. The Spanish Arians had appealed to the Catholic usage as sanctioning their heresy, and hence Catholics began to baptize with one immersion only. But this innovation only prevailed in Spain during a a short period, the Apostolic usage was soon restored, and has since been the rule of the Western Church. Single immersion in baptism has never been authorized in the Eastern Church, and its use is now, by many in the orthodox communion, considered as rendering invalid the administration of the Sacrament; but this cannot be considered as a sound opinion, theologians generally agreeing that the affusion of water on the person in the smallest possible quantity is sufficient for validity. [BAPTISM.]

[1] Foxe's Acts and Monuments, vol. ii. p. 295, ed. 1843.

[2] In the rubrics affixed to the Office for Holy Communion in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., it is ordered "that the sacramental bread was to be made larger and thicker than before, that it may be aptly divided into divers pieces; and men must not think less to be received in part than in the whole, but in each of them the whole Body of our Saviour Jesu Christ."

[3] Dr. Rock only quotes two miracles, which are related by St. Cyprian, that a woman of sinful life, on opening the book in which the Eucharist was reserved, fire burst forth, and she dared not touch it: and the case of another who, receiving unworthily the sacramental bread, opened his hand and found a cinder.

The ancient Anglican rubric on this subject was "Deinde accipiet Sacerdos infantem per latera in manibus suis, et interrogate nomine ejus, baptizet eum sub trina mersione, tantum sanctam Trinitatem invocando, ita dicens . . ." That of the first Vernacular Office for Baptism [A.D. 1549] was "Then the priest shall take the child in his hands, and ask the name; and naming the child, shall dip it in the water thrice. First, dipping the right side; second, the left side; the third time dipping the face toward the font; so it be discreetly and warily done; saying . . ." In the simplification of the rubrics at a later date the ancient practice was not named, but the tradition of the Church respecting it has been generally observed by careful priests.

TRINITY, the theological term for the union of the Three Persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, in One Godhead. Intimations of the truth expressed by this word are found in the Old Testament, though the doctrine was not then explicitly revealed and taught. Thus, in Genesis, we read of a plurality of Persons in the Godhead, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness" [i. 26]. No satisfactory reason has been given, if the Deity be in one Person, why the plural form should be here used. It is impossible for obvious reasons, according to an explanation often given, that the Almighty should associate Himself with angels in the work of creation [Job ix. 8; Isa. xliv. 24]. Besides, if so, man was created in the image of God and of the angels—"our image;" and God and the angels would be identified by the singular word "image." In the threefold blessing of the solemn benediction of the High Priest, the doctrine is also intimated [Numb. vi. 24]; and in the vision of Isaiah there is an ascription of praise to the thrice holy God [vi. 3]. In the apocryphal books, the Three Persons are also expressly alluded to.[1]

The doctrine of the Holy Trinity, though not expressly stated in the New Testament, is frequently and very clearly implied. Such might have been expected from the fact that the early Apostles were instructed by the oral teaching of the disciples, and that the Gospels and Epistles were written for the guidance of the baptized [Luke i. 1]. Hence we cannot expect to find this doctrine expressly stated in Scripture as in the form of a creed, and even the very explicitness of a well-known passage [1 John v. 7] might lead to a suspicion of its genuineness, though for other reasons it is rejected by modern critics as spurious. Every baptized Christian must have known, from catechetical instruction, that there are Three Persons in the Godhead, and that the Three are mysteriously One. No formal statement in Scripture was needed of a truth which all Christians recognised and believed. But though a formal statement of this fundamental doctrine by the writers of the New Testament could not have been expected, since none doubted it until long afterwards, still we may reasonably expect to find, as we do, a clear recognition of its truth. Thus, the distinction of the Divine Persons is set forth at our Lord's baptism [Matt. iii. 16, 17] by the voice of the Father, by the Holy Ghost descending like a dove, and by the Incarnate Son in the waters of Jordan. So also it is in Christ's promise that He would ask the Father, and He would send another Comforter [John xiv. 16]. And above all, in the form of Baptism, where the unity of the Divine Essence (in the Name) and the threefold Personality are clearly stated. Again, this doctrine is intimated in passages which teach the Divinity of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, as compared with others which expressly state the unity of the Godhead [Mark xii. 32; 1 Cor. viii. 6]. The teaching of Scripture is unintelligible or contradictory, unless on the supposition that in some mysterious sense there are Three Divine Persons, and yet only one God.

On referring to the Apostolical Fathers, the doctrine of the Trinity is implied as in the language of Scripture by the statement, express or implicit, of the Godhead of the Second and Third Persons, and the equal ascription of power, glory, and honour to each Person of the Trinity. [SPIRIT, HOLY.] After the Apostolic age, St. Justin in his First Apology [sec. 13] says of Christians, "We worship the Creator of this universe and Jesus Christ the Son of the Very God, holding Him to be in the second place, and the Spirit of Prophecy in the third." The first writer who expressly mentions the word "Trinity" is St. Theophilus of Antioch. He says, "The three days before the creation of the sun and moon are types of the Trinity (τῆς Τριάδος) of God, and His word and His wisdom."[2] St. Athenagoras, refuting the usual accusation against Christians of Atheism, declares that they believe in God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, shewing their power in unity (ἐν τῇ ἑνώσει δύναμιν), and their destinction in order (ἐν τῇ τάξει διαίρεσιν).[3] And St. Clement of Alexandria "gives thanks and praise to the alone Father and Son, with the Holy Spirit; all in One, in Whom is all, by Whom all things are one, by Whom is eternity."[4] Tertullian, in his treatise against

[1] "The author of the Book of Wisdom ascribes the creation of the world to the Word [ix. 1], and distinguisheth between the Wisdom (or the Word), ver. 2, and the Holy Spirit, ver. 17. This Wisdom he elsewhere calls the Worker of all things [vii. 22], having all power [ver. 23]; the Brightness of the everlasting light and the image of God's goodness [ver. 26]. We have a distinct acknowledgment of Father and Son [Ecclus. l. (li. ?) 10]. We have an account that the Word and Binah were before all things; and those in the Jewish books are put for the Divine Λόγος and Spirit [Eccles. v. 4, 5]. The Spirit of the Lord is said to fill the world" [Wisd. i. 7]. A striking passage is then quoted from Baruch, that "God shewed Himself upon earth and conversed with men." [iii. 35-37. Bp. Kidder's Demonstration of the Messias, part iii. ed. 1700.]

[2] Ad Autol. lib. ii. sec. 15. [3] De Legatione, sec. x.

[4] . . . αἰνοῦντας εὐχαριστεῖν τῷ μόνῳ Πατρὶ καὶ Υἱῷ, Υἱῶ καὶ Πατρὶ, παιδαγωγῷ καὶ διδασκάλῳ Υἱῷ, σὺν καὶ τῷ ἁγίῳ Πνεύματι· πάντα τῷ ἑνί· ἐν ᾧ τὰ πάντα· δι' ὃν τὰ πάντα ἑν· δι' ὃν τὸ ἀεί. [Pædagog, lib. iii. prop fin.]

Praxeas, states most clearly the unity of the undivided Godhead and the distinction of the Three Persons.[1]

Such may be called the scriptural and patristic doctrine of the Holy Trinity in its uncontroversial aspect:—the unity of the Godhead, and the distinction of the Three Divine Persons; but from an early period we find in the Fathers various and apparently discordant explanations on the subject, partly arising from a wish to answer the cavils or objections of hereties (sometimes by ill-advised and inadequate illustrations), and also from the inherent mysteriousness of the doctrine itself and the necessary imperfection of all earthly comparisons. Thus the Church believes, according to the definition of the fourth Council of Lateran [c. 2], that the Divine Persons are not specifically, but numerically One, a truth generally held by the Fathers, and expressly stated in the Athanasian Hymn.[2] But some of them, as St. Gregory Nyssen, seem only to teach the specific unity of the Divine Persons, comparing them to three men having a common human nature, a comparison which, strictly and literally interpreted, can only imply the tritheism of the Godhead. We cannot doubt the existence amongst orthodox Fathers of different opinions on this mysterious subject until its final definition by the Church.[3]

[1] He thus argues against Praxeas, who, like Sabellius, "confounded" the Persons of the Godhead, or denied any real distinction between the Three Divine Persons: "Unicum Deum non alias putat credendum, quam si ipsum, eundemque et Patrem et Filium et Spiritum Sanctum dicat: quasi non sic quoque unus sit omnia, dum ex uno omnia, per substantiæ scilicet unitatem et nihilominus custodiatur œconomiæ sacramentum, quæ unitatem in trinitatem disponit, tres dirigens, Patrem, et Filium, et Spiritum Sanctum. Tres autem non statu, sed gradu; nec substantia, sed forma; nec potestate, sed specie; unius autem substantiæ, et unius status, et unius potestatis [c. 2]. . . . Numerum et dispositionem Trinitatis, divisionem præsumunt unitatis, quando unitas ex semetipsa derivans Trinitatem, non destruatur ab illa, sed administretur. Itaque duos et tres jam jactitant a nobis prædicari, se vero unius Dei cultores præsumunt; quasi non et unitas irrationaliter collecta hæresim faciat, et Trinitas rationaliter expensa, veritatem constituat" [c. 3].

[2] "Neque confundentes Personas, neque substantiam separantes. . . . Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti una est Divinitas . . . non tres Æterni sed unus Æternus."

[3] Dr. Newman thus sums up from Petavius [De Trinitate, lib. iv.] the different opinions of the Fathers: "Some said that there was but one substance (ὑπόστασις) in the Godhead, others three ὑποστάσεις (substances or persons), and one οὐσία (substance), others spoke of more than one οὐσία. Some allowed, some rejected the terms προβολὴ and ὁμοούσιον, according as they were guided by the prevailing heresy of the day and their own judgment concerning the mode of meeting it. Some spoke of the Son as existing from everlasting in the Divine mind; others implied that the Logos was everlasting and became the Son in time. Some asserted his ἄναρχον, others denied it. Some, when interrogated by hereties, taught that He was begotten by the Father θελήσει; others, φύσει καὶ μὴ ἐκ βουλήσεως. ὅυτε θέλοντος τοῦ Πατρὸς ὅυτε μὴ θέλοντος, ἀλλὰ ἐν τῇ ὑπὲρ βουλὴν φύσει; others spoke of a σύνδρομος θέλησις. Some declare that God is ἀριθμῷ τρεῖς; others numerically one; while to others it might appear more philosophical to exclude the idea of number altogether in the discussion of that mysterious Nature which is beyond comparison, whether viewed as One or Three, and neither falls under nor forms any conceivable species." [The Arians of the Fourth Century, p. 127, ed. 1854.]

A fruitful cause of error in ancient and also modern times is owing to an attempt to explain or illustrate this doctrine, forgetting that it is a mystery to be received on faith, which cannot, from its own nature, be rendered intelligible to man's intellect. This was strikingly exemplified by the Trinitarian disputes in the English Church at the close of the seventeenth century, between Dr. Sherlock and Dr. South, both of whom were professedly orthodox, and wished to hold the true doctrine of Scripture and of the Church. Dr. Sherlock, with some abstruse and novel illustrations, maintained that there were three distinct intelligences in the Godhead, thus denying their numerical unity, and virtually asserting tritheism. Dr. South, in reply, represented the Divine Persons as modes, subsistences, and properties of the Godhead, thus setting aside their personal distinction, and incurring the charge of Sabellianism. [DIVINITY OF CHRIST. SPIRIT, HOLY. ARIANISM. UNITARIANISM. MACEDONIANISM.]

TRINITY SUNDAY. This festival was originally regarded as the octave of Pentecost only. The services have always been of such a character as to bring into prominence the doctrine of the Trinity, but it was not till later times that the day has been considered set apart as a feast, and there is much uncertainty about the exact time of its introduction. It seems clear that it was instituted by authority at an early period; but its observation was not enforced, and it was indeed of very partial observance. Durandus assigns its origin to the decay of faith in the Trinity, or the unsettling of men's minds, consequent on Arianism. "Verum superveniente heresi Arriana fere fuit fides Trinitatis extincta: sed Hilarius Eusebius et Ambrosius restituerunt. Consensit igitur eadem de causa Gregorius magnus ut de trinitate specialia cantaremus: et ecclesias in ipsius honorem edificaremus" [Durandus, Rationale, De Prima Dominica post Penthecostes]. This would fix the date about A.D. 600. At Liège the festival was established by A.D. 920, and was gradually adopted in neighbouring churches, though it was firmly established in most of the churches of France before it was adopted by Rome. Pope Alexander II. [A.D. 1061-73] discouraged it, saying there was no necessity for a special commemoration, as the praises of the Holy Trinity were daily sung by the Church in the hymn Gloria Patri. In the English Church the feast appears to have been established earlier than elsewhere. And the reckoning of the Sundays from Whitsuntide to Advent as "after Trinity" and not "after Pentecost," which is the rule in England and Germany, is thought to testify to an independent origin in those churches. An office for the festival is said to be extant in a MS. breviary at Monte Casino of the eleventh century. Peter de Blois, Archdeacon of Bath [died A.D. 1200], has a sermon on the text "Qui est misit me ad vos," in die Trinitatis [printed in Migne's Patrologiæ Cursus, 207, 637]. Martin, canon of Leon in Spain [died A.D. 1203], has a sermon of great length in Festivitate Sanctæ Trinitatis. St. Thomas of Canterbury, who was consecrated on the Dominica octavarum Pentecostes, appointed that Sunday for the feast of the Trinity [Inett's Orig. Angl. ii. 303]. The Council of Arles [A.D. 1260] decreed the Sunday after Pentecost as the day of the feast for that province. There were dioecesan varieties until the definite order of Pope John XXII. in 1334, from which date its universal observance in the Western Churches may be said to have commenced. In the Eastern Churches it is not noticed.

It has been noted [Riddle's Christian Antiquities, p. 645] that Potho, in his treatise De Statu Domus Dei [c. A.D. 1152], speaks of Trinity Sunday amongst novelties; and that St. Bernard of Clairvaux [died A.D. 1153] has no homily on the feast. The Paris ritual maintained a different use to Roman ritual until the present century. At many places the festival was kept on the Sunday before Advent. The collect, epistle, and gospel in the present English use are from that of Sarum, the collect appearing in the Sacramentary of St. Gregory.

It is worthy of notice, and the fact might be held to be evidence of the growing esteem in the English Church for this festival, that at the Reformation period the dedications to the Holy Trinity became more frequent. The colleges of the "Holy and Undivided Trinity" at Oxford and Cambridge, the corporation of "the Guild, Fraternity, or Brotherhood of the Most Glorious and Undivided Trinity," which is the official title of the Trinity House, date from this period. It was even attempted to suppress some of the old dedications, as at Ely, in favour of a new one to the Holy Trinity. It is also noticeable that in the statutes of some cathedrals of the new foundation the collect for Trinity Sunday was appointed to be said by all the members "inter surgendum;" and the hymn for evensong on Trinity Sunday, "Salvator mundi, Domine," was appointed for daily use. [Benedict XIV., De Festis Domini. Martene, De Antiq. Eccl. Discip. in Div. Celebr. Offic. xxviii. 22. Blunt's Annotated Book of Common Prayer.]

TRIPARTITE NATURE. [Body. Soul. Spirit.]

TRISAGION (from τρίς and ἅγιος—"thrice holy"). The ancient Liturgical Hymn, "Holy God, Holy and Mighty, Holy and Immortal, have mercy upon us" (Ἅγιος ὁ Θεός, ἅγιος ἰσχυρός, ἅγιος ἀθάνατος, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς). The Sarum form is, "Sanctus Deus, sanctus fortis, sanctus immortalis."

"It is a creed 'set hymn-wise,' having special reference to the work of God for man as set forth in the Scriptures" [Freeman's Princ. Div. Serv. ii. 338].

Its origin is commonly attributed [Robertson's Ch. Hist. i. 527, n.] to a miracle at Constantinople in the Episcopate of St. Proclus [A.D. 434], but it is probably much older, if not Apostolic. Freeman traces a plain connection between the Trisagion and the "Eighteen Prayers" of the Synagogue, the coincidences of expression being "too close to be accidental" [Freem. Princ. Div. Serv. i. 65, &c.]. In the Greek Liturgies it is sung after the bringing in of the Gospel. The priest says the preparatory "Prayer of the Trisagion in a low voice, while the people are singing the hymn itself. In the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom it is repeated five times, and its rationale is thus given in the Commentary of Symeon of Thessalonica, written early in the fifteenth century, as translated by Neale. "The Trisagion . . . manifests the mystery of Trinity; which the Incarnation of One Person of the Trinity manifested to men; and also the sympathy and union of angels and men. Wherefore, also, it is sung within the bema by the priests and without it by the clerks and laity: for one church of angels and men hath been formed through Christ."

Its use in the West is now confined to Good Friday, when it forms a part of the Improperia or "Reproaches." Then, according to the Roman use, it is said twelve times, first in Greek and afterwards in Latin, directly after the Gospel and its ninefold litany.

According to St. John Damascene, the Trisagion declared the faith of the Church in the Holy Trinity, the title "Holy God" being applied to the Father, "Holy and Mighty" to the Son, and "Holy and Immortal" to the Holy Ghost" [De Orth. Fide, lib. iii. c. 10] Hence, when Peter the Fuller, afterwards Bishop of Antioch [A.D. 485-488], added to it the words, "Who was crucified for us" (ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμᾶς), which could only refer to the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity, most serious controversies and disturbances naturally arose.[1] He was accused of thereby asserting various heresies, e.g., that the Holy Spirit was crucified, or that the Trinity suffered. When the altered Trisagion was sung in Constantinople by order of the Emperor Anastasius [A.D. 512], a violent tumult took place, in which many lives were lost. The people constantly refused any but the orthodox form, and the alteration found favour only with the Monophysites and Monothelites.

The Trisagion was used by the Council of Chalcedon as a declaration of the faith in the condemnation of Dioscorus. When his deprivation was proposed "shouts of applause were mingled with the solemn hymn of the Trisagion" [Bright's Ch. Hist. p. 404].

In the Sarum Breviary this hymn formed one of the preces for the office of prime, as it also did in the daily offices of other churches. It was followed by the Agnus Dei, a circumstance which calls to mind the alteration so vehemently rejected in the East. The name of Trisagion is often erroneously given to the Ter Sanctus, from which it is perfectly distinct both in form and use.

TRIUMPHAL HYMN. [Ter Sanctus.]

TROPOLOGICAL interpretation [τροπός = character, temper] is where a moral signification

[1] Τὴν ἐν τῷ Τρισαγίῳ προσθήκην ὑπὸ τοῦ ματαιόφρονος Πέτρου τοῦ Γναφέως γεγενημένην βλάσφημον ὁριζόμεθα [St. John Damascene, De Orth. Fide, lib. iii., c. 10].

is given to a passage. An illustration will explain this sense. In Deut. xxv. 4, we read: "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn." St. Paul [1 Cor. ix. 9] quotes this precept of the Law, adding the comment: "Doth God take care for oxen? Or saith He it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written" [cf. 1 Tim. v. 18. See also Ex. xvi. 18, applied in 2 Cor. viii. 15].

TRULLAN COUNCIL. [QUINISEXT.]

TRUTH. Truth may be understood in two senses, as a virtue and as a quality of propositions. It is that which makes persons truthful, it is that which makes statements true. The latter sense is the most important and the most difficult to fix, because the definition of truth that suits subjects to which our faculties are adequate does not suit subjects to which our faculties are inadequate. For instance, it would be an adequate explanation of what we mean when we say that a statement in a court of justice is true, that the statement is in accordance with the facts. This is the primary natural meaning of truth, and all our natural feeling towards truth is modelled on the meaning. But even in the sphere of concrete experience it is difficult to apply this meaning universally. If A swears that he saw B's hand go to C's pocket, and C's watch is found on B, it is clear that what A swore was true. If A says he saw and spoke to B and had an answer in London, at a time when B was in India, our first thought is that it cannot be true; A was mistaken, he saw and heard nothing. Practically we are right, in theory we have still to answer the questions, What caused the impression on A's eyes and ears: had the cause anything to do with B? if not, how does that make A's statement false, if the effect was the same? The answer suggests two conditions of truth—it is independent of the individual, and it requires our faculties to be in their normal state. These two conditions make up the working conception of truth for scientific purposes: such notions as the transformation of forms, or the conservation of force, are at once so difficult and so inadequate that the necessity of using them engenders a constant tendency to leave facts out of sight altogether, because the facts which correspond to these notions are not within reach of direct perception for us, while the facts which are lose their significance and stability in presence of these vast abstractions. Consequently, for science the truth is simply the permanent and universal object of human belief reached by the normal action of all human faculties which deal with evidence. As a working conception, the scientific view of truth is unobjectionable; it only becomes mischievous when it is made the model of our conception of religious truth, in which, if it exist, both scientific and practical truth must have their ground. It is still more difficult to apply the natural meaning of truth in theology than in science, because our conceptions are more utterly inadequate, and are formed, moreover, by different data and by different processes, so that it is easy to press them to contradict each other, and impossible to reduce them to a common unity. The result is a growing tendency to regard a zeal for investigating the evidence of religious propositions as a zeal for religious truth, and to represent all unpleasant consequences of this zeal as so many sacrifices to truth, which is supposed to require that each generation should regulate its religious belief by the balance of available evidence. This tendency was first formulated in England by Locke, though its influence is unmistakeable in Chillingworth. Since the time of Locke its authority has been steadily growing in spite of the transient interruptions it met with from Methodism and the Oxford movement of 1833. It was fully accepted by the eighteenth century apologists, who regarded Christianity as something to be practised rather than believed, and were satisfied if they could find enough evidence to prove such practice reasonable. It is a common mistake to regard this tendency as identical with the saying of St. Augustine, which since his time has been an axiom in the Church, "Deus cognoscendo ignoratur, ignorando cognoscitur;" for St. Augustine speaks of a learned ignorance, which does its utmost to realize and exhaust the conceptions that it rejects; to the school of Locke the proof we can at last know nothing is the substitute for learning. It is in fact a sufficient proof, that deciding according to the balance of evidence has nothing to do with the love of religious truth, that no duty is more universal than to receive the truth in the love of it, while no faculty is more rare than the power of weighing evidence on religious subjects; and it is strange that Locke should have confused this with the worthless knack which, he says, was common among the Huguenot peasants, of getting up the stock arguments on their own side. It is quite true that instructed Christians are in a condition to prove that the permanent balance of argument is on their side, in other words that the faith is the only and the simplest hypothesis to account for the facts of the Church. But they do not believe Christianity because they are able to do this, nor is Christianity true because they are able to do this; but they believe Christianity and are able to prove this belief because Christianity is true. Nor is this conviction acquired as a matter of fact by intellectual investigation, it is either inherited by tradition or adopted spontaneously because the believer wishes to believe: and this process is perfectly legitimate because our desires and our faculties of investigation, and the objects of each, are appointed alike by God. That we cannot help wishing to believe a thing is just as valid a reason for believing it, as that some one has seen it, whom we cannot contradict, for in both cases it is our nature to believe: we cannot change our nature, we mutilate it if we try.

It remains to shew how the natural conception of truth is applicable to the highest subjects: the answer is that truth on these subjects is relative; indeed truth is relative on all subjects, but it involves us in needless subtleties to insist on this when we speak of things to which our faculties are adequate. Absolute truth which is known to the spirits who see God, does not exclude relative truth, but includes it, and explains it by completing it. Relative truth may be said to be the right knowledge of the relations of things to God and to one another. Absolute truth is the knowledge of God, the ground of all relative truth and being. It follows that all relative truth is partial, because each relation presupposes something which is not relative. And to us relative truth is partial in another sense, because the relations known to us are affected by relations which we do not know, and therefore our knowledge even as relative knowledge is incomplete as a whole and in each of its parts. At the same time relative knowledge is real knowledge; if it were possible habitually to realize in consciousness that it is partial, it would be strictly true so far as it goes. We know nothing except what is related to our faculties, but we are not to suppose that our faculties project a representation which takes the place of and excludes this object. There is as much reason for saying that our faculties are constituted by their objects, as that they determine the representations which we substitute in our own mind for things. Things exist in virtue of this relation to us as well as in virtue of their relation to each other: our relation to God is as real as the relation of the world to Him. God made us and the world by His Word; His Word is Truth, in Whom we live and move and have our being, Who is Light, of Light, in Whose Light we shall see light.

TYPE. Type, from the Greek τύπος, means the counterpart likeness "struck" from any original form; as a coin from the die, an impress from the seal; or it is an outline sketch, as compared with the finished picture. It is the expression in a lower form of a higher perfection; shadows in time of eternal verities. The Law in its entirety, as well as in its several parts, was a type of the Gospel. The Gospel is a type of the life of Heaven. Religion as a theocracy upon earth typifies the eternal rule of the King of Saints. Analogy is the great law of nature, and ever-varying forms are deduced from plastic principles that are common to all. The comparative anatomy of the quadruped is a true type of the physiology of the human frame. History reproduces itself; and so in things divine, their shadow is forecast in earthly things. Type is in things what prophecy is in words, a present declaration of things future; or what allegory is to thought, a proportionate ratio; or what symbol is to truth, a mean of expressing it. If modern scepticism has made its most determined attacks upon PROPHECY, lowering it to ex post facto fulfilments or denying its genuineness, this mode of attack cannot get rid of types. Whatever may be their force, they can never have been fraudulently imported into the Bible account; they form part of the web and woof of Scripture, and cannot be separated from it without loosening the entire texture.

Typical actions that are only significant of matters of temporary or private interest need scarcely to be considered [1 Kings xi. 30, xxii. 11; 2 Kings xiii. 15; Isa. vii. 3, viii. 3, xx; Jer. xix. xxvii. li.; Ezek. iv. 1, 5, xii. 3, 5, 11, 18; Acts xxi. 11; Rev. xviii. 21]. These instances had no permanent significance; but they shew how completely the people had been taught to read the future by the light of types and figurative action. The whole of the Mosaic religion, in its typical rites and ordinances, was the rough cast of a higher futurity. Thus the tabernacle was a material representation of heavenly things; the type of a "greater and more perfect Tabernacle not made with hands" [Heb. ix. 11]. "See that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed thee in the mount" [Exod. xxv. 40; Heb. viii. 4]. The high priest "incompassed with infirmities" shewed forth the great High Priest of our profession [Heb. iii. 1], holy, harmless and undefiled; and the Levitical sacrifices had no other significance than that which they derived from the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world.

By the typical prefigurations of the patriarchal and Mosaic systems Christ is seen to be "the same yesterday to-day and for ever" [Heb. xiii. 8]. Adam was the type of Christ, ὅς ἐστι τύπος τοῦ μέλλοντος [Rom. v. 14], in a direct way, so far as both were representatives of the entire human race; Adam as containing within himself the undeveloped germ; Christ as gathering together in one the whole stock of the redeemed; in Him all, as says Irenæus [Camb. ed. ii. 87, 88, 95, 102, 120, 123, 159] are "recapitulated." But in other respects Adam was by antagonism and contrast a type of Christ, for "not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift: for the judgment was by one to condemnation, but the free gift is of many offences unto justification. For if by one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ. Therefore, as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners; so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous" [Rom. v. 16-19]. "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive" [1 Cor. xv. 22]. If the guilt of Adam's sin has brought the whole race under condemnation, the righteousness of Christ is more than commensurate to man's loss. Something in the same way the faith of Abraham embodies ancestrally the life of all who are justified by faith. He is the type of the entire Church of believers, even as the offering up of Isaac, his only beloved son, upon Mount Moriah was a symbol of the sacrifice of the Cross upon Mount Calvary, while he was himself a representative of the entire Body of Christ; "in Isaac shall thy seed be called" [Gen. xxi. 12; Heb. xi. 8]. Melchizedek, King of Righteousness and King of Peace, was a type of Christ, as declared by David [Psa. cx. 4] and confirmed by St. Paul [Heb. v. 7]. He brought forth the priestly offering of bread and wine, when Abraham gave to him "a tenth part of all" [Heb. vii. 2], and received in return his superior's blessing, for "without contradiction the less is blessed of the better" [Heb. vii. 7]. Christ and His Church were there present in personal symbol; the King of Salem the head, the father of the faithful the body. In course of time the Law, brought in because of transgressions, spoke of Christ to the gross heart of Israel in lively figures, all of which had the Cross of Christ and its results as their great exemplar. The Manna was the bread of God that came down from heaven; the Rock of which Israel drank was Christ; the brazen serpent on which the people bitten by fiery snakes in the wilderness looked with faith and were healed, was as the Son of Man lifted up, Who should draw all men to Himself. The wave sheaf that was offered on the second morning of the Paschal week from the first-fruits of the ripened corn [Lev. xxiii. 11], was a type of the Resurrection of Christ from the grave on the morrow of the Paschal Sabbath. These first-fruits must in fact have been offered in the temple before the veil rent from top to bottom, at the very time that our Lord's earliest appearance to the disciples took place, "the first fruits of the grave" [1 Cor. xv. 23, written at the Paschal season, 1 Cor. v. 7, xvi. 8]. Jonas, the effectual preacher of repentance to the Ninevites, shewed forth the efficacy of penitent faith, and became a type of the three days entombment of Christ in the sepulchre. Joshua, who led the people into the ancestral land of their rest, prefigured Jesus the restorer of an heavenly Canaan, lost in Adam but recovered in Christ.

All these particulars, to which very many more of minor significance might be added, constitute an argument from the typology of Scripture that speaks with the power and authority of prophecy. Any of these instances taken apart and alone might exhibit a purely accidental resemblance; but the whole taken together have a force that carries conviction to the mind. They are far too numerous and too remarkable to have been produced by accidental resemblance. They confirm the truth of the Christian religion, while they throw a light upon all the transactions which have been brought to pass by the immediate Providence of God. They shew the exactness with which events apparently trivial have been recorded with an eternal purpose, and they display throughout all ages unity of counsel, pursuing a mighty end by means surpassing human knowledge and human power. [See Chevallier, Hulsean Lect. A.D. 1826. Fairbairn, Typology of Scripture.]

U

UBIQUITY. The erroneous opinion of some German Divines, that the Body of Christ is present everywhere by virtue of its union with His Divine Nature. The opinion was adopted as a mode of explaining the Eucharistic Presence by the Divines who compiled the Formula of Concord at Bergen, in A.D. 1577 [AUGSBURG CONFESSION], and has been held by many Lutherans, though the notion was rejected with indignation by Luther himself when first suggested. It is plainly inconsistent with the actual Ascension of our Lord, and with the local Presence of His glorified Body at the right hand of God [SESSION OF CHRIST]. "We hold it . . . a most infallible truth," says Hooker, "that Christ as Man is not everywhere present. . . . His human substance in itself is naturally absent from the earth, His Soul and Body not on earth but in heaven only" [Hooker's Eccl. Polit. V. lv. 7].

ULTRAMONTANISM. The doctrine and system which assigns to the Pope an unlimited authority in matters of faith and discipline in consequence of his personal infallibility. It is the height of the papal system as distinguished from the episcopal system: Ultramontanism lodging in the Pope the whole authority of the Church, and looking on all other bishops as his deputies only.

We have Fleury's authority for stating that the infallibility of the Pope was not introduced into the Schools until the fifteenth century. Fournier (afterwards Benedict XII., elected A.D. 1334) denied an assertion of the Fratricelli, that what had been decided by one pope in questions of faith and morals could not be recalled by another pope; and Fleury remarks, "Such were the sentiments of this cardinal, raised afterwards to the Holy See for his merit; and the opinion of the infallibility of the Pope was not introduced into the Schools for more than a hundred years after" [lib. xciii. cap. 15]. Bellarmine, indeed, quotes for the personal infallibility of the Pope only Albertus Pighius, of the sixteenth century. This opinion he calls probable, not certain. The opinion that the Pope, even as Pope, may be a heretic and teach heresy, if he defines in the absence of a general council, and that such cases have happened, he calls not properly heretical, inasmuch as some holding it have been tolerated by the Church, but altogether erroneous and very near akin to heresy. He names Nilus (Cabasclas, Archbishop of Thessalonica, A.D. 1340), and following him Gerson, Almain, Alphonsus de Castro (born A.D. 1495, who calls those who ascribe infallibility to the Pope "impudentes papæ assentatores," words which he was obliged to omit in later editions), and Hadrian VI. Jeremy Taylor's comment upon this is, that these authorities are tantamount to an acknowledgment that for one thousand years together the Fathers knew not of the doctrine of the Pope's infallibility [Liberty of Prophesying, vii. 12]: "there had been no decree, nor tradition, nor general opinion of the Fathers, or of any age before them."

The opinion which Bellarmine holds to be most certain may be taken as the standard of Ultramontanism in this its leading feature up to the present time. It is that the Pope, whether or not he can himself be a heretic, can in no case define anything heretical to be received by the whole Church. Bellarmine opens it in two propositions: [1] the Pope when teaching the whole Church, in matters of faith, cannot err; whence follows the corollary, the particular Church of Rome cannot err. [2] Not only in decrees of faith is it impossible for the Pope to err, but neither can he err in precepts of morals which are prescribed to the whole Church, and which relate to things necessary to salvation, or to such as are good or bad in themselves [Bellarm. Disputatio de Summo Pontifice, iv. 2-5]. Here are to be noticed particularly the limitations, [1] of the Pope's teaching the whole Church, or speaking ex cathedra; [2] of the subject-matter of the teaching, matters of faith or morals necessary for the whole Church, things in their own nature good or bad.

Bellarmine's arguments shew that he attributed this power, whether as a privilege of inerrancy or as a gift of infallibility, to the Pope personally, and not to the Church or to the episcopate collectively. For example, our Lord's prayer for St. Peter [Luke xxii. 32] is interpreted of two privileges, [1] that Peter should never lose the true faith, a privilege which perhaps has not descended to Peter's successors; [2] that Peter as "Pontifex" should never teach contrary to the faith, a privilege which no doubt has descended to Peter's successors. And herein lies the difference between the two schools of the Romish Church. "To the great Gallican divines, however respectfully they spoke of the Pope, he was but one element in the infallibility of the whole Church." The body of the episcopate, united in its head, said Bossuet, is where must be found the depôt of Church doctrine. But, to the mind of the Gallicans, the Pope's being the centre of unity did not make him the ark of the depositum.

It is noteworthy that Bellarmine's arguments for his first proposition do not touch upon any promise to the Church as a body. The arguments are the extension to St. Peter's successors of Luke xxii. 32, of Matt. xvi. 18, of John xxi. 16; of the Jewish high priest's possession of Urim and Thummim; and lastly from history, that all patriarchal seats except the Romish have failed, whereas the Pope has condemned heresies without a general council. Modern Ultramontanes however proceed in their arguments through the privileges of the body of the Church. The decision of the Pope and that of the Church can only be one and the same; but the decision of the Church is infallible, therefore the decision of the Pope is infallible. Such a mode of proceeding brings out clearly the principles of the two systems. In the one, the assembling of a council is only a means which the Pope may take at his own discretion to inform himself regarding the matter in question, and the authority of his decision is from his enunciation of it ex cathedra; in the other, the consent of the Church is that which gives authority to the decision, and the council is a means of expressing that consent, as well as of obtaining in the highest degree the fulfilment of the promises which are made to Church assemblies. "To say that the enunciations of the Pope become infallible through their reception by the whole episcopate would be a one-sided statement of Gallicanism; because such universal reception would equally render infallible any statement of faith which a provincial council should draw up against heresy: only in this case the Bishop of Rome would be an important member of those who should receive it" [Pusey's Eirenicon, ii. 291].

According to this view of the Œcumenic Council, namely, that it is an instrument for the Pope's information before forming his decision, the power is claimed for him of summoning, of presiding, and of confirming its acts. And by this the final step is taken in the degradation of the episcopate.

The opposition in France to Ultramontane doctrine has been shewn in detail elsewhere. [Pragmatic Sanction.] In Germany there was a shew of resistance by the Congress of Ems in A.D. 1786, when the three spiritual electors of Germany and the Archbishop of Salzburg passed articles which would have all but superseded the Papacy. Joseph II. was bent on curtailing the power of the Pope, and favoured the independence of a national episcopate: but the movement of the Congress was too much connected with his reckless innovations to be successful [see the history in Rohrbacher, vol. xxvii. pp. 255-261].

UNCTION, EXTREME. The anointing of the sick, which has been called "extreme" since the twelfth century, because it is the last in order of the unctions used in ecclesiastical rites, such as those associated with Baptism, Confirmation, and Ordination. In the Eastern Church this rite is called Εὐχέλαιον, or Ἅγιον ἔλαιον, the "Prayer Oil," or the Holy Oil; and some analogous names for it were anciently used in the Western Church, such as "Oleum benedictionis," and "Olei sacrati Unctio:" "Unctio infirmorum" is a still more primitive name.

I. History of the Rite. As our Lord directed the Apostles to use some kind of baptism during the time of His own ministry, so He also directed them to anoint the sick. The definite direction is not in either case given in the Gospel, but it must be without any reasonable room for doubt inferred from the words "Jesus Himself baptized not, but His disciples" [John iv. 2], and "they anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them" [Mark vi. 13]. There is no reason to think that the Jews had any custom of anointing sick persons, and of course it is mere trifling to allege that the Apostle used oil as physicians might have used it, for the healing properties that it was supposed to possess. Our Lord was sending His Apostles forth with "power over unclean spirits," and it is added that as a fact they exercised this power, "they cast out many devils," and there is no reason whatever for dissociating the healing of the sick by anointing from the miraculous power which He then bestowed upon His agents.

"Gifts of healing" are mentioned as a customary and well-known supernatural power bestowed upon the Apostolic Church [1 Cor. xii. 9, 28]; but they are not verbally associated with any rite of anointing. About thirty years after the time when the Apostles had gone forth anointing with oil many that were sick and healing them, a similar rite is mentioned by St. James: "Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the Name of the Lord" [Jas. v. 14]. This does not look like the institution of a rite unknown to the Church before, for it is immediately preceded by the words "Is any among you afflicted? Let him pray. Is any merry? Let him sing psalms;" and it is quite certain that neither prayer nor psalm singing were unknown until they were here mentioned by St. James. There seems no little reason, therefore, to suppose that there is a direct association between the rite named by St. James and that used by the Apostles under the direct command of our Lord; and if this be the case there is also a great probability (to say the least) that the "gifts of healings" mentioned by St. Paul were a continuation of the divinely instituted healings by unction during the thirty years' interval.[1]

The unction thus ordained and used in the [1] This is made still more probable by the fact that in both places where St. Paul names them he speaks of them as something separate from "miracles," as if they were part of the ordinary and not of the extra-ordinary supernatural work of the Church.

Apostolic age is not once named by the early Fathers or historians of the Church. Such silence is very remarkable, and no satisfactory explanation of it whatever can be given. That an Apostolical ordinance should have so soon become disused as not to have come within the experience of St. Cyprian and Tertullian, or even of St. Chrysostom or St. Augustine, seems improbable, and yet if it had come within their experience it could hardly have escaped notice in their voluminous writings. But even if it had gone entirely out of use, it is very singular that writers who referred to nearly everything that is mentioned in the New Testament should not once have referred to a rite of so remarkable a character. The case is made still more strange by the fact that unction was undoubtedly associated with Baptism, and that the ceremonial use of oil was thus perfectly familiar to the writers in question.

The first reference to unction of the sick after the time of St. James is found in an Epistle of Innocent I., written in reply to one of Decentius, Bishop of Eugubium, in the year 416. The rite then existing is distinctly, and as a matter of which no doubt had been raised, associated by Innocent with the rite mentioned by St. James; but he adds that the holy chrism being blessed by the bishop it can be used not only by the bishop and by the priests, but also by lay people, who may anoint with it "in their own or their friends' necessities" [Innocent, ad Decent. resp. viii.]. In the Sacramentary of St. Gregory the Great [A.D. 590] there is a very short office entitled "Orationes ad visitandum Infirmorum," in which there is a rubric "Ungues eum oleo sancto, et dices," followed by a collect with the words "Deus Omnipotens . . . miserere hinc famulo Tuo, et tribue ei remissionem omnium peccatorum, et recuperationem ab imminenti ægritudine per hanc sanctam unctionem, et nostram deprecationem:" and from that time the rite has a distinctly marked place among the customs of the Church in both the East and the West.

II. Mode of Administration. From the Epistle of St. Innocent to Decentius, already referred to, it is evident that the administration of the rite was not, in the fifth century, restricted to the clergy. It is equally evident that it was considered absolutely necessary for the oil to have received the benediction of a bishop. No other trace is found of its administration by laymen, either in the Eastern or the Western Church: and in the Western Church the benediction of the oil by a bishop is still, and always has been, considered essential. It has been usually blessed on Maundy-Thursday at the same time with the chrism for Baptism, Confirmation, and Ordination, but instead of chrism pure olive oil has been always used. The custom in the Eastern Church, on the other hand, is for some oil taken from the sanctuary lamp to be blessed in the sick man's room by seven priests, or by at least three [Neale's Hist. East. Ch. p. 1036].

In the Roman ritual the blessed oil is applied, in the form of a cross, to the seats of the various senses, the eyes, ears, nostrils, mouth, and hands, a form of words appropriate to each particular sense being used during the anointing. The same custom was used in the mediæval Church of England, but at the Reformation a simpler, and probably more primitive, mode was adopted, that of anointing, in the form of a cross, only the forehead or the breast of the sick person. The Reformation Office of the Church of England consisted of a collect and the thirteenth Psalm, but this was expunged from the Prayer Book in A.D. 1552 by the influence of the Puritan Reformers, and has never been reinserted.

III. Object of the Rite. The general analogy of our Lord's personal miracles, wrought only, as they were, on persons in whom He discerned faith to be healed, would lead us to the conclusion that when the Apostles anointed the sick and healed them, the bodily healing was accompanied by some spiritual blessing also; and, thus, that the anointing was not only of a miraculous, but also of a sacramental character. Such a conjunction of miracle and grace is clearly shewn in the words of St. James, who says that "the prayer of faith"—by which, of course, must be understood not verbal prayer alone, but the whole rite, the "Orationes ad visitandum infirmorum"—"shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if he have committed sins they shall be forgiven him." This twofold effect of the rite has always been maintained by those who have attached any value at all to it. The ancient Collect of St. Gregory's Sacramentary has been already quoted as praying for the remission of the sick person's sins, and for his recovery from his sickness by means of the unction. So in a sermon of Cæsarius of Arles, fifty years later, there occur the words, "See, brethren, that he who has recourse to the Church"—he is speaking of this rite, and quoting the words of St. James—"will both receive health of body and obtain remission of sins." Similar doctrine is to be found in a multitude of writers throughout the Middle Ages, and at the Reformation period we come to the statements made respectively by the Church of England and the Church of Rome. That of the former is found in the "Institution of a Christian Man," to the effect, "All Christian men should repute and account the said manner of anoiling among the other Sacraments of the Church, forasmuch as it is a visible sign of an invisible grace: whereof the visible sign is the anoiling with oil in the Name of God; which oil (for the natural properties belonging unto the same) is a very convenient thing to signify and figure the great mercy and grace of God, and the spiritual light, joy, comfort, and gladness which God poureth out upon all faithful people, calling upon Him by the inward unction of the Holy Ghost. And the grace conferred in this Sacrament is the relief and recovery of the disease and sickness wherewith the sick person is then diseased and troubled, and also the remission of his sins, if he be then in sin." This is further expressed in the later edition of the same work, the "Erudition for any Christian Man," in the words, "We ought assuredly to trust that God, working in the ministration of His Sacraments, doth by the prayer of the minister, and of such as assist him, forgive those sins of the sick man, which, by the frailness of his nature, in sudden motions and vehement agonies, he doth commit and fall into." In the Catechism of the Council of Trent, which was apparently suggested by the noble English work just quoted, Extreme Unction is said to remit lighter offences, to rid the soul of the languor and infirmity brought on it by sin, and of all other remains of sin: to strengthen the soul in its last contest with the Tempter, and to alleviate the burden of sin. The recovery of health, if advantageous to the sick person, is also said to be a benefit of the sacrament, but one rarely obtained because of the weakness of faith in these days as compared with the faith of Apostolic days [Catech. Trident. II. vi. 14].

In modern times the Providence of Almighty God has so developed the science of healing and the skill of the surgeon, that we may naturally suppose He works by these natural means rather than by supernatural: and that hence the "raising up" of the sick man by means of anointing is rarely to be looked for. But no corresponding spiritual process of development has superseded the necessity of His grace in the hour of man's greatest need and extremest weakness, and it may therefore be believed, in accordance with the whole stream of Christian belief until recent times, that the spiritual blessing declared to attend the unction of the sick is still given by God. Thus it is a means by which (in the words of the first English Prayer Book) the dying man may have "ghostly strength by His Holy Spirit to withstand and overcome all temptations and assaults of his adversary, that in no wise he prevail against him, but that he may have perfect victory and triumph against the Devil, sin, and death, through Christ our Lord." But as modern English bishops do not bless oil for the purpose this means of grace is at present withheld from their flocks. [Serarius, De Sacr. Extrem. Unct. Bishop Forbes on XXXIX. Articles. Blunt's Sacraments and Sacramental Ordinances].

UNIGENITUS. A Bull of Pope Clement XI., dated September 8th, 1713, and condemning one hundred and one propositions taken from Pasquier Quesnel's "'Le Nouveau Testament en François, avec des reflexions morales, &c.; à Paris, 1699." In this bull centred the attempts of the Romish Church to suppress Jansenism.

The struggle with the opinions named after Jansen began with the condemnation of Baius. Michael Baius, born A.D. 1513, was professor of divinity at Louvain, and attended the Council of Trent. In 1567, Pius V. condemned seventy-six propositions extracted from his works. The bull of condemnation was only privately notified to Louvain, but it was afterwards published by Gregory XIII. The tenets condemned relate to most, if not all, of the doctrines adopted by the professed followers of Augustine, such as the natural powers of man, free-will, grace, merit, justification; and agree closely with the tenets of Jansen, who, says Bergier, wrote his Augustinus to justify the opinions of Baius; Quesnel writing his book to propagate Jansenism. The Augustinus (published after Jansen's death) was censured by Urban VIII. in 1641; and again in 1653 the five propositions of Jansenism were condemned by a bull of Innocent X.; "again by Alexander VII. in 1656, whose subsequent bull of 1665 prescribed a formulary to be signed by all the clergy receiving the above bulls and condemning the propositions in the sense of Jansen. This was followed in 1705 by the bull of Clement XI., confirming the former, and condemning the subterfuges of the Jansenists." [JANSENISM.] The immediate occasion of the bull Unigenitus was this. Du Pin published a Case of Conscience in 1703, which was the cause of the bull of 1705, and of another in 1708. In this last the Moral Reflections of Quesnel were expressly condemned. Quesnel answered the bull "with a spirit which inflamed the contest," and the anti-Jansenist ordinance was issued.

Clement was moved to take this step by Louis XIV. There was a difference in the supreme council of France. Noailles, while Bishop of Chalons, had approved the Moral Reflections, and on his removal to Paris had procured the publication of a new edition in 1699: others in the council adhered to the doctrines of the Jesuits. The influence of the king's confessor gave these latter the ascendancy, and gained over the king: and as the ordinance of 1708 could not be received or published in France, not being conformable to the usages of the State, Louis applied to Clement to condemn Quesnel's book by a constitution in form. His application is stated in the bull itself.

Louis' letters patent for the publication of the bull were not registered in the Parliament without several modifications and restrictions. It was then acted upon for a time; but was suspended, through the influence of Noailles, under the regency of Philip, Duke of Orleans. Noailles and other prelates had refused to accept it, and appealed to a general council. The divines of the Sorbonne declared that the decree for accepting it was false. Sixteen bishops suspended the bull in their dioceses. They were supported by the Universities of Paris, Rheims, and Nantes, and by the Paris Faculties of Theology, Law, and Arts; and the Jansenist party were called Appellants, as appealing to a general council. Ultimately, however, Noailles recalled his appeal. A papal brief had been issued in 1718 threatening severe measures against all who opposed the constitution, as the brief was called. A provincial Council at Evreux condemned Jansenism, and directed the observance of the bull. Noailles reconsidered the matter, and accepted the bull without modification. Through the influence of Fleury the bull was registered.

The tenets of Quesnel were really those of Jansen, and the five propositions condemned by Innocent X. give the principles from which flow the one hundred and one propositions condemned by Clement XI. But in statements of doctrine which involve the very deepest points of theology there cannot but be frequent uncertainties as to the exact meaning of the terms employed; and it is on the one hand asserted, on the other hand denied, that the doctrines of Quesnel and Jansen are the doctrines of Augustine. On this point the statement appears to be most probable that the language of Augustine, when taken with regard to the circumstances in which he wrote and the usage of his time, will not carry the meaning which the Jansenists understood it to bear. Again, the same cause, the weakness and comparative poverty of all language, occasioned that which has been often objected to the Jansenists as subterfuges and theological chicane, the reasonings by which many of Jansen's followers reconciled themselves to the bull which condemned Jansen himself. Not a few of the propositions condemned are capable of a catholic sense and capable of an erroneous sense. Jansen might have held them in the former sense, the Pope having condemned them in the latter.

Mosheim has remarked, and many others after him, that the difficulties in the way of a reconciliation between the Protestants and the Romish Churches were greatly augmented by the Bull Unigenitus. Perhaps the augmentation does not arise so much from the doctrinal decisions as from the clauses regarding the study of Holy Scripture.

UNION HYPOSTATIC, ἕνωσις καθ' ὑπόστασιν, was a term of dogmatic Theology first used by Cyril of Alexandria, in his second and more famous epistle to Nestorius [A.D. 430], the year preceding the convention of the Ephesine Council. The term occurs four times in that epistle, and was evidently chosen as conveying a very definite and accurate notion of the union of the two natures in Christ. For he does not say that this union was effected κατὰ πρόσωπον, personally, but καθ' ὑπόστασιν, according to the "reality" of either nature, the Divine and the Human, individualized in the one Christ. It was the φίλη λέξις of Cyril, the champion for the truth raised up to combat the third of "those grand heretical impieties, which most highly and immediately touched God and the glorious Trinity" [Hooker, v. 3], in the first ages of the Christian Church. A COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM was the result of this union καθ' ὑπόστασιν, whereby the two natures having been inseparably united in the one Person of Christ, the properties and accidents and attributes of either nature are ascribed to both by reason of this same individuality of person. "A kind of mutual commutation there is, whereby those concrete names God and Man, when he speaks of Christ, do take interchangeably one another's room, so that for truth of speech it skilleth not whether we say that the Son of Man hath created the world, and the Son of God by death hath saved it, or else that the Son of God did create, and the Son of Man die to save the world. Howbeit, as oft as we attribute to God what the Manhood of Christ claimeth, or to Man what His Deity hath right unto, we understand by the name of God and the name of Man neither the one nor the other nature, but the whole Person of Christ, in whom both natures are." [Hooker, v. 53; compare the noble passage in Hippolytus, C. Noet. 18; Routh, Opusc. i. 72.]

In the Manhood of Christ there was an hypostatic union of the two different substances of soul and body; in the Person of Christ there was a similar union of the Manhood thus constituted, and of the substance of the Word in one Person.[1] So that the Manhood never had a personal subsistence apart from the Word, but the creation of the first original germ of humanity on the Annunciation, and the personal union of the Word with it, took effect at one and the selfsame moment of time; and the Person of the Word, which had pre-existed eternally in the mere glory of the Son of God, became the Person also of the Man Christ Jesus. He took not the Person of any one Man, but He took upon Him our nature, and dwelt, ἐσκήνωσεν, in us as very Man; so that Christ as God knew the deep things of God, which could not be comprehended by His unglorified Manhood. Thus, "No person was born of the Virgin but the Son of God; no person but the Son of God was baptized, the Son of God condemned, the Son of God and no other person crucified" [Hooker, v. 52]. The hypostatic union once formed was never again to be dissolved, and it continued to subsist during the period of death, so that the Godhead was with the body of Christ in the tomb, and with the human soul of Christ in Hades, and we believe that He shall come again in the same hypostatic union of God and Man in one Christ, the blessed pledge to us of our own personal immortality. [Hooker, v. 51-55. Ep. Cyr. Alex. Harvey's Vindex Cath. i. 173-176.]

UNITARIANISM. The name assumed by its supporters for a heresy which repudiates the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity, and denies the Divine nature of our Lord Jesus Christ and of the Holy Ghost.

Unitarianism is the modern outcome of the ancient line of heresies which were represented by MONARCHIANISM. The licentiousness of "free-thought" took the direction thus indicated very early in the Reformation period, Luther complaining of it bitterly at the Marburg Conference of A.D. 1529, and reproaching the Zwinglian party as the cause of it. Two influential members of the Zwinglian party had, indeed, been teaching the Unitarian heresy for some years, viz. Ludwig Hetzer and John Denck, the latter being a professor at Basle. Hetzer was a personal friend of Zwingle, who had brought him over to his own party from that of the extreme Anabaptists in the year 1525. For a time he was associated with Denck, but his profligacy repelled Denck and others of his friends. Hetzer maintained the absolute unity of God, utterly repudiating all idea of a Trinity of Persons. Christ he considered as a mere man, but of a highly spiritual and typical character. He was dissuaded by Zwingle from publishing a blasphemous treatise against our Lord's Divinity, for which at his death he expressed great gratitude. Hetzer was beheaded at Constance [A.D. 1525] for frequent adultery and gross immorality. Denck's theories were of a more profound kind. In his book on "the order of God and His creatures" he seems to have identified the Logos with conscience, taking a mystical view of the "Light which lighteneth every man" in John i. 2, and this he placed above Revelation as an "inward Word" which was of higher authority than an "outward Word." Christ he regarded as a typical man, always in moral unity with God, and hence holding the office of a Mediator and Saviour. But the work of salvation he considered to be a mere moral life of each individual person according to his natural ability; and though he looked on Christ as the highest Example of such a life, he did not attribute any supernatural force to His sufferings and death. He, of course, denied the existence of sacramental grace. Denck died at Basle of the plague while residing there as the guest of Œcolampadius in the year 1529. In the same year Conrad of Gassen was put to death in the same city for professing similar principles respecting our Lord: but the heretical work of these Lutheran foes of Luther was carried on by Sebastian Franck of Donanwörth in Suabia, Claudius of Savoy, Campanus, David Joris of Delft (whose body was disinterred three years after his death and burned at Basle in 1559), and by many others: the line of succession eventually falling on Servetus and Faustus Socinus.

[1] "Ergo persona hominis mixtura est animæ et corporis; persona autem Christi, mixtura est Dei et hominis. Cum enim Verbum Dei permixtum est animæ habenti corpus, simul et animam suscepit et corpus." [Aug. ad Volus. Ep. cxxxvii. 11; see also ad Evod. Ep. clxix. 8.]

Miguel Servede, the Spaniard whose name is most familiar in its Latin form of Servetus, was only twenty-two years of age when he published his work De Trinitatis Erroribus, and a book of Dialogues, having, however, already made himself notorious at Basle and Strasburg by his public denial of the doctrine of the Trinity. For some years he practised medicine at Paris under the name of Michael de Villanueva, but giving up the medical calling he passed some time in the south of France, and in A.D 1541, was taken into the household of the Archbishop of Vienne. In the year 1553 he published a work entitled Christianismi Restitutio; and shortly afterwards, being condemned for heresy and escaping, he passed through Geneva on his way to Italy. There he was imprisoned by direction of Calvin, who, seven years before, had written to Farel that if Servetus ever came to Geneva he would take care that he should not leave it alive. They had long been acquainted, and even on terms of confidence, Calvin being entrusted with private papers by Servetus, but they now attacked each other with the bitterest virulence. Servetus was tried for heresy, condemned on October 26th, 1553, and the next day burned alive. His theological speculations are strongly tinged with Neo-Platonist philosophy, and they would probably have taken the ultimate form of Pantheism, having been continually developing in that direction during the twenty years of his literary career. Unitarianism was, in fact, only one phase of his theology, and the subject of his earliest work, written while he was a mere youth.

From the time of Servetus, the history of this heresy is that of SOCINIANISM, until its revival in England in the later half of the seventeenth century. There was, indeed, a feeble current of Arianism running through much of the early theology of Puritanism, and not a few avowed Arians were burned in every reign from Henry VIII. to James I., but these were ignorant fanatics. The literary beginning of Unitarianism in England dates from the year A.D. 1647, when a Puritan master of Gloucester Grammar School, named John Biddle [A.D. 1615-1662], published a work entitled Twelve arguments against the Deity of the Holy Spirit, which was followed up in A.D. 1648 with another, Confessions of Faith concerning the Holy Trinity. Biddle afterwards translated and published the Racovian Catechism, for which he was imprisoned by the Parliament. His books were burned, and he himself sentenced to death, but his sentence was commuted to imprisonment in St. Mary's Castle, Scilly. A sect sprung up from his teaching, which at first went by the name of "Biddlians," and its adherents grew so numerous that Dr. Owen, in A.D. 1665, declared that there was not a town or village in England where Unitarians were not to be found. Unitarianism was, in fact, the form into which the theology of the intellectual Puritans developed, Milton being a conspicuous instance; and its spread in England dates from the eight hundred Puritan ministers (erroneously spoken of as two thousand) who refused to take Holy Orders at the restoration of the Church, and were ejected from their benefices on St. Bartholomew's day, A.D. 1662. The English Unitarians from that time were known under the name of Presbyterians, and it was only occasionally that Antitrinitarian principles became conspicuous—as in such men as Sir Isaac Newton and John Locke, and as in the controversy which resulted in Bishop Bull's great work of A.D. 1685, the Defensio Fidei Nicænæ. Their theology, however, took a more definite line under the influence of Dr. Priestley in the latter part of last century. That great natural philosopher was originally an extreme Calvinist, then an Arminian, afterwards a "qualified" believer in the Atonement, his philosophical studies ultimately landing him in Materialism. He left England for America in the year 1794, and living there for the last ten years of his life, contributed much to that extensive spread of Unitarian opinions in the United States which has characterized their religious history. In England the Unitarians have never been numerous as a distinct sect, but Unitarianism is the common ground of all Rationalism which falls short of actual Deism. [Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

UNITY OF THE CHURCH. The unity of the Church is an article of the Creed, "One Catholic and Apostolic Church," and is therefore held de fide by all branches of the Church. It follows as a consequence from the Union of Christ with His Church. The Church is the extension of His Incarnation. He became flesh that He might be head over all things to the Church. Through this mystical union all that the Head received is communicated to the members of the Body. The various terms in which this relation is represented in Scripture all signify that union, and are thus summarized by St. Chrysostom:—"He is the Head, we are the body; He is the Foundation, we are the building; He is the Vine, we are the branches; He is the Bridegroom, we are the bride; He is the Shepherd, we are the sheep; He is the Way, we are the travellers; we are the Temple, He the Inhabitant; He is the First-born, we are the brothers; He is the Heir, we are the co-heirs; He is the Life, we are the living. These things ἕνωσιν ἐμφαίνει." [Chrysost. Hom. viii. in 1 Cor.] The Church consists of the company of the faithful who are on earth and those who are at rest, for both are united together in the Unity of Christ, so that their fellowship with Him is the ground of their union one with another. This unity between Christ and the members of His Body is a real and not a metaphorical unity. The word Body is never used in Holy Scripture to signify a federal agglomeration, but an organic totality. The closeness of this union is shewn by our Saviour's prayer that the members of the Body might be one, as He and the Father are One [John xviii. 21]. The unity therefore is not a unity of faith and practice, or of affection only, but it is a unity of nature, like that which is shared by the several Persons in the Blessed Trinity, who are Three Persons and yet One God. By their union with Christ the members of His Body become partakers of the Divine Nature as well as of His regenerate Manhood. Even as our Lord had two natures united in one Person, so the Church is at once divine and human. The Church is the perpetual manifestation of Christ to the world. The Head is Divine, but the members are human, yet through the Incarnation the Head partakes of the human nature; and the members are made partakers of the Divine, because they have been made in baptism participators of the regenerate Manhood which the Divine Head took unto Himself. [Bishop Forbes on XXXIX. Articles, vol. i. p. 266.]

I. The Church is the one Body, the Body of Christ the Head. It is never spoken of as a body of believers, but as the Body of Christ. This unity involves the communion of saints and a common participation in all the gifts and graces which descend from the Head to the members.

II. The final cause of this unity, the end for which it was ordained, was the renewing of fallen man after the image and likeness of God, and the reuniting him to God.

III. The meritorious cause of the Church's unity is "Christ crucified," Who purchased it with His own Blood [Acts xx. 29].

IV. The formal cause is the Holy Spirit, through Whom we are united into one Body under Christ the Head, Who is the one Mediator between God and man [1 Tim. ii. 5]. The Holy Spirit imparts a life-giving power to the Sacraments, and His indwelling is the medium of union with Christ in the members of the body.

V. The instrumental cause is the Sacraments. [1] By Baptism we are made one with Christ, born again of water and of the Holy Spirit. [2] By the Holy Communion this union is cemented and renewed. Christ becomes one with us, and we one with Him; and this communion is not only with the Head, but between the members also. The One Bread is composed of many grains, which represent the members of the Body [1 Cor. x. 17], and in the cup the mixture of water and wine represents the union not with Christ only but with His people. St. Cyprian says [Ep. lxiii.], "Since Christ, Who bore our sins, beareth us all also, we perceive that in the water the people is understood, in the wine the Blood of Christ is represented. But when with the cup water is mixed with wine then the people is united to Christ, and the company of believers clearly joined to Him on Whom we believe. Which union of water and wine in the cup of the Lord is so intimate that the elements when mingled cannot be separated one from the other. Thence nothing whatever can separate the Church from Christ or prevent that love continuing firm and undivided."

VI. The efficient cause is Christ acting through His ministers, for although His ministers baptize and administer the Holy Communion, they act not by their own power, but ministerially according to the commission which they have received from Christ. He works with them and gives efficacy to their acts. There are many members in the Body, and to each some special office is assigned, and the clergy succeeding each other in uninterrupted succession from the Apostles are as the bands which bind together the rest of the members in one Body.

The unity of the Church is therefore preserved by the Sacraments administered by a duly constituted order of clergy, who transmit from generation to generation the commission which was first given to the Apostles. However isolated from each other the different branches of the Church have become, every genuine branch has received this commission and derived its succession from one common source, as may abundantly be proved from the history of the Church; and although they are separted from each other in external communion, in real internal communion they possess the common inheritance of an apostolic order of ministers, unity of Creeds and Sacraments, "one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism." However customs may vary, they each retain by a singular providence all that is essential to the validity of sacraments and the transmission of orders. This organic unity corresponds to the union of the Father and the Son, but "the subjective unity which is the result of human but God-given love, and the harmony of human wills, must be a primary duty and a condition of our wellbeing, not to be sacrificed, except unwillingly as a necessity involved in the conditions required" [Pusey's Eirenicon, part iii. p. 6].

The normal condition of the Church supposes free intercourse and a common communion existing between the different branches of the Church, and for a continuance of this our Saviour prayed in the petition that His people might be one; but this prayer implied the possibility of visible communion being interrupted, an abnormal condition which unhappily at present exists. It must therefore be considered how far the unity of the Church may be preserved amidst the interruption of visible communion. The Church of Rome excommunicates all churches which do not acknowledge the supremacy of the Roman See. It has never however authoritatively taught that the orders of the churches excommunicated are absolutely invalid, but only that they are irregular and deficient in conferring mission. The Church of England acknowledges the orders of the Roman and Oriental clergy and does not reordain those who enter her communion. With the exception of the "Filioque" clause, which is easily capable of explanation, all churches hold, in the three creeds, all that is essential to the Christian faith. Mutual explanations of definitions of faith on which they differ, and mutual forbearance with respect to national rites and customs, may be the means in God's good time of restoring to the Church such a visible unity as every Christian should desire.

The other things in which unity consists are either facts resulting from the unity or duties involved by it. The communion of saints in all gifts and graces, and the possession of a common hope, belongs to the first, whilst the sympathy, love and charity, which Christians owe each other are duties which result from their union in the Body of Christ. That all churches possessing an apostolic ministry and a common faith are included in the Body of Christ, notwithstanding the interruption of external communion, follows from what has been said; but the case of dissenters and those religious communities which have lost an apostolic ministry is one of greater difficulty. It cannot be denied that many eminent graces adorn the lives of some who are thus separated from the visible unity of the Church. Either these graces must be the result of human effort, which would contradict the words of our Lord, "Without Me ye can do nothing;" or else they must result from their indwelling in Christ. St. Augustine saw the difficulty, and his solution is one which may in charity be received without diminishing our sense of the evil of schism, or of the great importance of unity to the Church. "The Church is a living Body, in which there is a soul and body; and the soul is the internal gifts of the Holy Spirit, faith, hope and charity. The Body is the external profession of faith and communication of Sacraments: whence it happens that some are of the soul and body of the Church, and are thus united to Christ the Head, both externally and inwardly, and are most perfectly of the Church, for they are as living members in the body. Some again are of the soul and not of the body, as catechumens and excommunicated persons if they have faith and charity. Others, lastly, are of the body and not of the soul, as those who have no internal virtue, and yet through some hope or fear profess the faith and communicate in Sacraments, and such are as the nails and excrescences or evil humours in the human body" [St. Aug. in Breviculo Collationis, 3].

UNIVERSAL REDEMPTION. A doctrine expressly taught in Scripture and by the Fathers of the early Church: that Christ's atoning Sacrifice is of infinite value, and that He shed His Blood for all men, with a real, though not an absolute and unconditional, will for their salvation. This truth is clearly stated and often implied in Holy Scripture. It is implied in the solemn declaration that God willeth not the death of a sinner [Ezek. xviii. 23, xxxiii. 11; 2 Pet. iii. 9],[1] that Christ came to seek and to save the lost [Matt. xviii. 11], and by the explicit statement that Christ shed His Blood for all men: the same truth being declared under various forms of expression—that He died for the sins of the "world," the "whole world," "every man" [Isa. liii. 6; John i. 9, 29, iii. 17, iv. 22; Rom. v. 18; 2 Cor. v. 14, 15, 19; 1 Tim. ii. 4-6; Heb. ii. 9; 1 John ii. 2].

That the passages above quoted can only be understood in their literal and obvious sense will appear from the fruitlessness of the many attempts, in ancient and modern times, to interpret them in accordance with the theory of predestination. "How much perplexity," says Gieseler,[2] "this passage [1 Tim. ii. 4] occasioned St. Augustine, is proved by his numerous and very forced attempts to explain it. Thus, at one time he explains 'all' to have the same meaning as 'many'[3] [De Correp. et Gratia, c. 14; Contra Julian. lib. vi. c. 8], at another, he thinks 'all men' means 'men of all sorts,' that is of all ranks and stations, 'omnis generis' [Enchiridion, 103]; he also gives the strange explanation, that God is said to wish all men to be saved, because He makes us wish it by pouring His love into our hearts [De Correp. et Gratia, c. 15]; and again, that this passage has the same meaning 'as if it was said that no man can be saved unless God wishes him to be saved.'"

Modern writers have not been more successful than St. Augustine in eluding the obvious meaning of the passages quoted. Calvin, following one of the interpretations of St. Augustine, says that "all" means men of all sorts or ranks.[4] It is strange that learned writers could be satisfied with this subterfuge, or even propose it as tolerably plausible; for "men of all ranks," however we may interpret the phrase, can only mean some [1] "O miserrimos, si nec juranti Domino credimus" [Tertullian, De Pœnitentia, c. iv.].

[2] Gieseler, Eccl. Hist. vol. i. p. 383; Clark's transl.

[3] St. Augustine also interprets "all" as meaning all the predestinated: "omnes prædestinati, quia omne genus hominum in eis est" [De Correptione et Gratia, c. 14].

[4] "Nulli hominum ordini viam ad salutem præcluissse" [Inst. iii. c. 24].

persons, and thus cannot be identical or synonymous with "all."

The explanation given by modern Calvinistic writers is simply an evasion of the plain sense of Scripture. "No one," says Emmet (referring to Christ's dying for all men, or for the sins of the world), "at all acquainted with the lofty and figurative style of the Oriental writers is surprised to find the same lofty and, if I may so say, hyperbolical manner of speaking is generally to be met with in the Bible;"[1] and he quotes Acts ii. 5; Col. i. 23; 1 Cor. iv. 5, in proof of his assertion, that the "whole world," "every man," &c., may have reference only to a limited number, and that consequently it was only in a "qualified sense" that the Redeemer is said to have died for all. But the first two passages quoted are merely proverbial expressions common to all languages, and would not mislead whether understood literally or with limitation; while in the third passage, the word rendered "praise" signifies reward in a good or bad sense, or retribution, so that it is obvious that these passages afford no support to the arbitrary interpretation of the Scripture teaching on the universality of redemption which this writer proposes.

Again: "It seems impossible," says Toplady, "that Christ could die for all. Some, for instance, in our Lord's time at least, were guilty of that sin which He Himself has pronounced absolutely unpardonable, and would He die for the pardon of those whose sin He avers shall never be pardoned?" He then speaks of "those many final impenitents whose departed souls had been in the place of torment ages and ages before Christ was crucified at all," and that Christ could not "possibly shed His Blood on the Cross for those very souls which were at that time suffering for their sins in hell."[2] But even admitting (which is not certain) that some in our Lord's time had committed the unpardonable sin, and that others were in the place of torment, this affords no proof that they had not been redeemed by Christ's Blood, or had the means and opportunity of salvation. This writer forgets that Christ is "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world," or that His death had a retrospective efficacy affording the means of grace and salvation to those who lived before, no less than after His coming; otherwise, patriarchs and righteous men of old must have been excluded from the benefits of His atonement.

There is another so called explanation of the passages before us, which is perhaps more plausible, but really quite as unsatisfactory. "Undoubtedly," says Vaughan, "there are simple elements in the Divine mind which make Him unwilling that any should perish, which would incline Him to desire that all should repent and be saved; but when the purpose of God is regarded, in which the operation of many simple elements co-existent in the same mind is combined, He cannot be said to will the salvation of all men; to will that all should be brought to repentance; to will that no sinner should die. It is plainly will and no will; that is, there are leadings and leanings in His mind to the point and on the side of mercy, but those leadings and leanings are counteracted and overruled. His whole mind, His mind in action, is against such an exercise of mercy."[3] According to this theory, the clearest declarations of the Divine will are uncertain; for, by what criterion are we to determine whether any part of Revelation be spoken with regard to the simple or combined elements of the Divine mind? But to shew its fallacy, let us interpret a most important declaration of Scripture according to the principle here laid down—"The wicked shall be turned into hell." These are, we shall say, "undoubtedly elements in the Divine mind" which would incline Him everlastingly to punish the impenitent, but there are other elements, His mercy, love, &c., which "counteract" these, and induce Him to save all: so that His threat of everlasting punishment to the wicked is plainly "will and no will." His "whole mind," "His mind in action" is against such an exercise of severity. Admit the theory of this writer, and it must fairly be allowed that we have furnished the Universalist, who denies the eternity of future punishment, with plausible, if not unanswerable, argument in defence of his opinion.

Leaving Calvinistic perversions of scriptural teaching, it may further be asserted that the doctrine before us is clearly implied in the declarations of the Bible generally, understood according to their obvious or usual meaning. Thus, the Gospel is to be preached to "every creature" [Mark xvi. 15], but unless every creature be redeemed by Christ's Blood, the preaching of the Gospel, in most cases, must necessarily be ineffectual and useless: the offers of mercy and salvation are also to be made unreservedly to all, and the sinner's condemnation is never assigned to his being excluded from the blessings of redemption, but to his own unwillingness to repent and be saved. [FREE WILL. REPROBATION.] The Predestinarian may attempt to put an interpretation on such declarations to render them accordant with his theory, but assuredly, in their obvious meaning, they presuppose or imply the doctrine of universal redemption. Again: that this doctrine is really in harmony with scriptural teaching, may also, at least, be probably gathered from the fact, that the "redeemed" and the "saved" are not represented as synonymous, or embracing the same persons: the Scripture clearly states the possibility, at least, that some of the redeemed will finally perish [Rom. xiv. 15; 1 Cor. viii. 11]. This does not prove the universality of redemption, but undoubtedly implies that Christ shed His Blood for others besides the elect, or those who shall finally be saved.

But a portion only of the language of Scripture bearing on our subject has yet been quoted: there are apparently statements limiting or contradictory to the doctrine of universal redemption. Thus, Christ is said to have given His life a ransom for "many:" He died for "the sheep;" He "loved His Church and gave Himself for it:"—as if, in other words, He died only for those who shall finally be saved [Isa. liii. 12; Matt. xx. 28, xxvi. 28; John x. 11; Eph. v. 25; Heb. ix. 28].

[1] Statement of the Scriptural doctrines called Calvinistic, pp. 96, 97, A.D. 1835.

[2] Historical proof of the doctrinal Calvinism of the Church of England, i. 314, A.D. 1774.

[3] Calvinism Maintained, p. 113.

That Christ, in an especial sense, died for those who shall finally be saved is unquestionable, as they only at last will reap the benefits of His atonement, but this is not irreconcileable with the doctrine of universal redemption:—Christ giving his life for "many," or for "the sheep," does not contradict the more explicit statement that He tasted death for every man. The apparent discrepancy is reconciled by St. Paul's words, that "God is the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe" [1 Tim. iv. 10].

The doctrine of universal redemption has never been authoritatively defined by the Church. Like other doctrines not controverted in early ages, it was generally held, and there was no need of ecclesiastical definition.[1] When the Predestinarian controversy originated, St. Augustine, according to the exigencies of his theory, denied this doctrine [CALVINISM], though there are not wanting passages in his writings in which the primitive and scriptural view is maintained.[2]

In the Second Council of Orange [Aurausicanum II., A.D. 529], it was defined that all the baptized, with the aid of Divine grace, may fulfil the conditions of salvation; and they are anathematized who assert that any are predestinated to evil.[3] Thus, Christ died for more than those who shall finally be saved, He died at least for all the baptized, or members of the Church.

This is the sum of authoritative definition on the doctrine (de fide), all that has been authoritatively defined by the Western Church in early ages; hence, modern theologians, as Tournely[4] and Perrone say (in the words of the former) of universal redemption, "Vera est, pia, Catholica et proxima fidei sententia."

In the Council of Trent, we find in substance the teaching of the synod of Orange,[5] and a repetition of the language of Scripture, that Christ died for all.[6] Two popes (Innocent X. and Alexander VII.) have condemned the proposition that it is Semi-Pelagian to say that Christ died or shed His Blood for all men.

The Predestinarian (Augustinian) controversy was almost unknown, or excited little attention in the East. The doctrine of universal redemption, as taught by the Fathers of the Greek and Latin Church, is now held by the Eastern Church, and is thus expressed in the "Orthodox Confession" (quæst. xlvii.): "Christ upon the Cross fulfilled the Priesthood (ἐπλήρου τὴν ἱερωσύνην), offering Himself to God and the Father for the redemption of the race of man, as speaks the Apostle of Him . . ." [1 Tim. ii. 6].

The Church of England unquestionably teaches that Christ died for more than the elect, or those who shall finally be saved: she maintains in the Catechism, that the Son of God redeemed "all mankind;" in the 31st Article, that the Offering of Christ was made "for all the sins of the whole world;" and to every communicant is said, "The Body of our Lord Jesus Christ which was given for thee. The Blood . . . which was shed for thee."

The teaching of the Church of England is thus inconsistent with the Calvinistic theory, that the elect only have been redeemed by Christ's death; agreeing with the decree of the Council referred to, that all the baptized have been really placed in a state of salvation. It probably goes even beyond this definition, when declaring in the 31st Article, that the Offering of Christ is that "perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction, for all the sins of the whole world, original and actual." And though the mere use (without explanation) of a scriptural phrase, "the whole world," would hardly afford definite proof of the teaching of our Church, yet it must be observed that we have not merely in the article the repetition of a scriptural expression, but an important addition is made which strengthens and renders its meaning more definite. St. John says, "Christ died not for our sins only, but for the sins of the whole world," but in the article we read, that the Offering of Christ was for "all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual." It seems impossible with greater precision to express the doctrine of Universal Redemption.

UNIVERSALISM. The belief (founded on a denial of the doctrine of eternal punishment) that finally impenitent sinners (after, it may be, temporary suffering in the future world), and also the devil and fallen angels, will at last be forgiven and restored to happiness. This opinion was held by Origen and his followers in the early Church, and at the present day is maintained by some sects, especially by those which maintain the Unitarian theory. It is also held, in a less definite manner, by some otherwise orthodox Christians. As a distinct sect the Universalists are hardly known among English people, but they have obtained a very widespread and firm footing in America. As an opinion, however, Universalism is very common among English laymen, and has been maintained even by a few divines; the most influential of whom, in recent times, has been Professor Maurice.

[1] The consensus of the Fathers on the universality of redemption before the Augustinian controversy, is shewn by Petavius, De Incarnatione, lib. xiii., and Vossius, Historia Pelagiana, lib. vii.

[2] Thus he says of Judas, "Projecit enim pretium argenti, quo ab illo Dominus venditus erat, nec agnoscit pretium quo ipse a Dominus redemptus erat" [Enarrationes in Psalmos, lxviii.].

[3] Hoc enim secundum fidem Catholicam credimus, quod accepta per baptismum gratia, omnes baptisatos Christo auxiliante et co-operante, quæ ad salutem animæ pertinent, possunt et debeant si fideliter laborare voluerint adimplere. Aliquos vero ad malum divina potestate prædestinatos esse non solum non credimus sed etiam si sunt qui tantum malum credere velint, cum omni detestatione illis anathema dicimus [Canon xxv.]

[4] Prælectiones de Deo.

[5] De Justificatione, can. 17.

[6] Sessio vi. 3.

The final restoration of all sinners to happiness, and the favour of God, is maintained by Universalists on the ground that the final exclusion of any soul from happiness would be contrary to the illimitable love of God: that the wrath of God is only exercised against sin, and against the sinner while guilty of sin; repentance, even in the future life, bringing about a restoration to His love. But this supposes a distinction between sin and the sinner which is not only without foundation in Holy Scripture, but is contradictory to its statements. We are nowhere told as regards a future state that God's wrath against sin will only continue so long as sin remains, but that the sinner himself who dies impenitent will be eternally punished. They, says our Lord, the wicked, will go into everlasting punishment: the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever.

Again, it is asserted that the Scripture has no plain dogmatic statements at all as to the possibility or impossibility of repentance after death (i.e. in hell). There are terrible threats of divine vengeance which will overtake the ungodly; but there are some distinct utterances of a hope embracing all times, existences and states, and the specific question at issue does not seem to be raised in Scripture. Such utterances are supposed to be contained in 1 Cor. xv. 22-28; Eph. i. 9, 10; Phil. ii. 9-11; Col. i. 19, 20.[1]

[1] It is evident that the passages which Universalists thus quote, to the effect that "every knee shall bow at the name of Jesus," or that all things in heaven and earth shall be subjected to His power, do not imply the truth of universalism, since evil spirits, both now and through eternal ages, as was the case when our Lord lived upon earth, will obey His commands and acknowledge His supreme dominion. In similar quotations from the Ephesians and Colossians we have a statement of the object or purpose of redemption. In the former Epistle St. Paul says that it was God's εὐδοκία, or gracious purpose, to gather together, not only redeemed humanity, but all things (τὰ πάντα), animate and inanimate, under one Head; and in the passage from the Epistle to the Colossians the same word is used (εὐδόκησε), and the purpose of Redemption is described in similar terms, "that it was God's gracious design that in Christ should all fulness dwell, and that by His Cross all things should be reconciled to God, both which are on earth and also in the heavens." The Apostle's meaning by "things in the heavens" is unknown, but the passage cannot fairly be supposed to imply more than God's purpose or design, which, as we learn from other passages of Scripture, through man's sinfulness has not been accomplished. The passage from the first Epistle to the Corinthians may most plausibly be cited in sanction of the theory before us. The Apostle says "that as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive"—that all things shall be subject unto Christ, and Christ Himself be subject to the Father, that God may be "all in all." Now such declarations, taken in what appears their literal sense, undoubtedly may be understood in the sense of universal restoration, i.e. that all created beings will be subdued to the gracious sceptre of Christ, and that God, in fulness of knowledge and love, will be "all in all." This interpretation is not only doubtful, however, but for obvious reasons, improbable. The Apostle, it must be noticed, in this chapter is speaking only of the happiness of the saints, and the future state of the reprobate is not alluded to: this manifestly, as will be seen, limits the meaning of "all," i.e. those in whom God will finally dwell, and shews in what sense it must be understood. The Apostle's meaning may be thus paraphrased, He first says that there will be a universal resurrection, that as all die through union with Adam, so, through Christ's assumption of our nature, all will rise from the dead: and then adds, that Christ is the first-fruits of the resurrection, and afterwards that they that are Christ's will rise at His coming: to these, i.e. the saints, he subsequently alludes. Christ, he says, will put all enemies under His feet; every hostile power that afflicted His Church will be destroyed; death, their last and greatest enemy, will be finally vanquished, and the happiness of the redeemed will be consummated: "God will be in them all in all." These words (in illustration of these passages) are referred by the Fathers, as St. Augustine, St. Jerome, St. Gregory Nyssen, and St. Bernard [see à Lapide, in loco], to the eternal felicity of the saints, which is the completion of happiness, as our union with God will then be perfect, not alloyed or interrupted, as in the present world, by infirmity or sin.

Universalism

Now, it may fairly be admitted that the passages quoted do appear to favour Universalism, and might have been so understood had it been elsewhere taught in Scripture; but they are of no weight whatever in opposition to its clearest and most emphatic declarations. The Apostle here says that God will be all in all, that all things shall be subdued unto Christ, reconciled unto Himself, and that every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father, but such declarations must be viewed in connection with other passages of Scripture which contradict the doctrine of universal restoration; and also according to scriptural usage and the meaning which can only be given to many parallel passages. Thus our Lord says that, when lifted up on the Cross—referring to the present efficacy of His atonement—He will draw all men unto Him. No declaration can be more positive and unequivocal, and yet literally understood it is not merely untrue, but contradictory to other statements of Scripture, as e.g. that no man can come to Christ except the Father draw him, and that they only are drawn who hear and learn of the Father [John vi. 44, 45]—certainly not all men. Such is the usage of Scripture: a thing is spoken of as being really effected, to indicate the certainty of the purpose, and that every provision has been made for its being accomplished, though eventually through man's sinfulness, God's purpose may be frustrated.

Again, Christ died for all men, and God would have all men to be saved—obviously leading to the supposition, at least, that all mankind will at last be saved: yet in other passages of Scripture there is apparently a discordant statement that Christ died for "many," laid down His life for "the sheep;" and the object of redemption is said to be to gather together in one the children of God which are scattered abroad.

Now these considerations may serve to illustrate the declarations of St. Paul, who speaks of Christ's redemption as if fully realized in the universal restoration and salvation of mankind, a result which becomes impossible through man's wilful disobedience and refusal of the offers of grace. Again, let it be observed that the two differing and apparently contradictory forms of expression quoted from Scripture are necessarily subversive of the theory of universalism: nothing is clearer than the statement of an universal provision of grace, and the application of it only to certain individuals. All are redeemed, the sheep only are saved: the many are called, few are chosen. The King [see Isaiah vi. 5, τὸν βασιλέα Κύριον σαβαὼθ εἶδον, comp. with John xii. 41] on the Cross, when one of the malefactors perished in his sins, and the other was saved by the precious Bloodshedding, typified the irreversible sentence to be proclaimed on His Throne of Judgment, when the righteous enter into the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world, and the wicked shall depart into everlasting fire.

It has been alleged that the three Epistles to the Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians having been written at the close of St. Paul's career, were free, bold, and hopeful as to the result of Christ's redeeming work, and abstained from assigning any limit to it. But on referring to the Epistles to the Thessalonians, probably the first written by St. Paul, we shall find that the eternal punishment of the wicked is stated most emphatically: he speaks of their being punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord [2 Epist. i. 9]. "Chrysostom and Theophylact ask can any one venture to say that future punishments are only for a time?"[1] but if St. Paul in later epistles spake more hopefully of the future state of the impenitent, how can we think that he wrote under Divine guidance and inspiration. The very supposition of a total change of opinion on this all-important subject can only be made on the theory that he was in the same position as other uninspired teachers; and thus, after years of ministerial experience, he saw reason to modify his statement to the Thessalonians, or rather to abandon it: a supposition it may be admitted probable enough in the case supposed, but totally impossible if the Apostle wrote under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

As a further proof of the untenableness of the theory before us, a few remarks may be added on the arguments in its favour by Martensen. He admits that the doctrine of eternal punishment is taught or clearly implied in Scripture in such passages as Matt. xii. 32; Mark ix. 43, and 1 John v. 16, if taken in their literal sense; but asserts that the doctrine of universal restoration is also clearly taught according to the literal meaning of passages before quoted from St. Paul's Epistles. He says: "This apparent contradiction in the language of Scripture shews that Scripture itself does not afford us a final dogmatic solution of the question. He who seeks to establish the doctrine of (ἀποκατάστασις) universal restoration, must invalidate those texts which make mention of eternal damnation, must limit and pare them down according to this idea; and he who would establish eternal damnation as a dogma by means of Scripture is obliged to limit and pare down those texts which speak for the ἀποκατάστασις, according to this idea: for example, when the Apostle says 'as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive,' he must explain the second 'all' as meaning 'some,' and he must take the first 'all' in a particular and equally restricted sense. We readily grant that the Word of God cannot contradict itself, and that the antinomy here presented must really be solved in the depth of God's Word. We only maintain that this solution is nowhere expressly given; and we ask whether we may not recognise Divine Wisdom in the fact that a final solution is not given while we are still in the stream of time and in the course of development?"[2]

The question at issue is not in the passage quoted fairly and impartially brought forward. It might be supposed from Dr. Martensen's statement that there were a number of passages in Scripture implying universalism, and others teaching eternal condemnation, whereas there is only one passage of really doubtful meaning in St. Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians which seems to favour universalism; and on the other hand, there are express and oft-repeated declarations in the Old Testament, and by the Apostles and our Lord, which, in their obvious and literal sense, are inconsistent with such meaning, and explicitly teach and imply the doctrine of God's eternal punishment of sinners. Again, it is not correct to say that the "apparent contradictions of Scripture do not afford a final dogmatic solution of the difficulty," since the apparent contradictions are of no real weight—an obscure and difficult passage against the clearest, most unequivocal declarations. But even supposing the truth of Martensen's statement, let us examine its inevitable result. He says that the eternal condemnation of the wicked is taught in some passages, and universal restoration is implied in other declarations of Scripture; in this case the only conclusion can be that the teaching of Scripture is not apparently, but really contradictory. Both opinions cannot be true, nor by any subtlety of language be reconciled together. If St. Paul does teach the theory of universal restoration, his teaching is unequivocally opposed and contradictory to many express declarations of Holy Scripture; and it is simply absured to say, that there are depths in the Divine Word to reconcile statements obviously contradictory, or that the assertions however explained or interpreted can be true, that the finally impenitent shall and yet shall not be eternally punished. The Lutheran bishop, however unwillingly, is, in common phrase, playing into the hands of infidel writers, who say the Bible is full of contradictions, and as such (and who if the statement be true can deny the inference) cannot be from God.

The theory of final restoration shews the danger of rejecting in the interpretation of Scripture the guidance and traditional faith of the Church, which has never sanctioned that interpretation of St. Paul's teaching which Dr. Martensen and others plausibly maintain. That it is, and must be, untrue is certain from the fact that it would (as already stated) involve the declarations of Scripture in utter confusion and contradiction.

[1] Bishop Wordsworth's Comment. on the New Testament, in loc.

[2] Christian Dogmatics, p. 476; Clark's transl.

V

VATICAN CODEX. An ancient Greek MS. of the Old and New Testaments quoted as Codex "B." It was placed in the Vatican Library early in the sixteenth century, and is numbered 1209 in that collection. Its history, previous to its being deposited at Rome, is unknown. What was defective in the original MS. has been supplied by a late cursive hand, and it has been thought that this was done when it was presented to the library.

It is written on very thin vellum, in small uncial characters. There are three columns to the page, except in the stichometrical portions of the Old Testament, where two columns are used. There were originally neither accents nor breathings; but these have been added, though so delicately as to be now almost invisible. The initials are of the same size as the text, but larger initials have been added in the margin. The following is the order of its contents:—

Genesis (incomplete).
Exodus.
Leviticus.
Numbers.
Deuteronomy.
Joshua.
Judges.
Ruth.
1, 2, 3, 4 Kings.
1, 2 Chronicles.
1, 2 Esdras.
Nehemiah.
Psalms (incomplete).
Proverbs.
Ecclesiastes.
Song of Solomon.
Job.
Wisdom of Solomon.
Wisdom of Sirach.
Esther.
Judith.
Tobit.
Hosea.
Amos.
Micah.
Joel.
Obadiah.
Jonah.
Nahum.
Habakkuk.
Zephaniah.
Haggai.
Zechariah.
Malachi.
Isaiah.
Jeremiah.
Baruch.
Lamentations.
Epistle of Jeremiah.
Ezekiel.
Daniel.
4 Evangelists.
Acts.
James.
1, 2 Peter.
1, 2, 3 John.
Jude.
Romans.
1, 2 Corinthians.
Galatians.
Ephesians.
Philippians.
Colossians.
1, 2 Thessalonians.
Hebrews (incomplete).

The greater part of Genesis is wanting, the MS. beginning at πόλιν, εἰς γῆν, Gen xlvi. 28. There are deficiencies also from Psa. cv. 27 to cxxxvii. 6, and in a few isolated passages; the Pastoral Epistles[1] and Book of Revelation are altogether wanting, and the MS. ends at Heb. ix. 14, τῷ θεῷ καθα . . . the rest being supplied by a later hand. The Epistle to the Hebrews was intended to come between the Epistles to the Galatians and Ephesians, as appears from the numbering of its sections.

The Gospels have neither the Ammonian sections nor the Eusebian canons; nor even the division into larger chapters, but another which is unique. They are divided into 170, 61, 152, and 80 sections respectively. Similar divisions are made in the Acts and Catholic Epistles, the Epistles of St. Paul being regarded as one book. There are fewer contractions than in most ancient MSS., a few dialectic peculiarities occur, such as λήμψονται, εἶπαν, συνκαλοῦσιν, the ν ἐφελκυστικὸν before consonants, and others. It is generally considered as of the earlier half of the fourth century.

This Codex was used as the basis of the Roman edition of the LXX. in 1586. It was first collated by Bartolocci in 1669. About A.D. 1720 Dr. T. Bentley examined and described it; and it was collated by Mico for Dr. R. Bentley, his MS. being preserved at Trinity College, Cambridge. Birch collated the New Testament, except the last two Gospels, and in 1788 published his edition of the Greek Gospels. The long-promised edition by Cardinal Mai, the printing of which was completed in 1838, was at last issued in 1857. It is printed in ordinary Greek type, of rather large character. In this edition the lacunæ in the original are supplied not from the corrections and continuations of the Codex itself, but from other codices in the Vatican Library. Thus the defective portion of Genesis is supplied, partly [chaps. i.-v.] from MS. 1 Reg. Sve., and partly from MS. 10 Reg. Sve. The Pastoral Epistles are taken from MS. 1761, of the tenth century; and the Apocalypse from MS. 2066, attributed to the eighth century. Other lacunæ are supplied from various sources, noted as they occur.

The editor corrects obvious errors of the copyist, mentioning the fact in each case. The only instance of the later portion of the Codex itself being used in this edition is in the Psalter. The Cardinal attributes the non-appearance of the work to his dissatisfaction at his own labours. "Sibi facile suasit suam editionem, nisi curiosius noviterque castigaretur, criticis studiis haud maxime profuturam; utpote quæ non satis accurata evasisset." The whole was therefore again carefully collated, and some pages wholly re-done. The Cardinal did not live to write exhaustive Prolegomena, but a preface was found among his papers when he died in 1854. The present issue was prepared by Vercellone. The edition fell far short of what the learned world had been led to hope for. Tischendorf says of it, "Procul eam esse a perfectiore forma, quam viri docti et criticarum rationum amantes tali in opere vel maxime requirunt, quum ipse celeberrimus editor satis sensisse videtur, tum ingenue professus est præfationis auctor. . . . Nihilominus omnium collationum supplementa præbet plurima, nec exiguum nostri apparatus exstitit subsidium."

[1] The Pastoral Epistles are not even supplied by the later hand; but some editors, as Dr. Bloomfield, have, through some strangely careless mistake, given readings from these epistles, as from Codex B. [Horne's Introduction, ed. Davidson and Tregelles, A.D. 1856.]

Professor Ormsby published in 1860 a Greek Testament, with notes from this edition, and prefixed a notice of the Codex, which is chiefly taken from Hug, De Antiquitate Codicis Vaticani Commentatio, written by Hug when the Codex was at Paris in 1810.

VAUDOIS. [WALDENSES.]

VENIAL SIN. [SIN.]

VERNACULAR, from "verna," the slave born in the house, formerly signified "endemic" or "indigenous;" so in the time of the Commonwealth Dr. Harvey speaks of consumption as being the "vernacular disease of England." The term, however, is now restricted to dialect, meaning the common language of a country, which is the only language for its service of prayer and praise: "It is a thing plainly repugnant to the Word of God, and the custom of the Primitive Church, to have public prayer in the Church, or to minister the Sacraments in a tongue not understanded of the people" [Art. XXIV.]. The civil law commanded that the Eucharist should be celebrated so as to be heard and understood by the people, "We will and command that all bishops and priests celebrate the Holy Eucharist, not in a low voice, but with a loud and clear voice, which may be heard by the faithful; that thereby the minds of the hearers may be raised with greater devotion to set forth the praises of the Lord God; for so the Apostle teacheth in his first epistle to the Corinthians." [Justinian, Novell. 123, 137.]

The evidence in Scripture is wholly in favour of a vernacular service. The first operation of the Holy Spirit in the Christian Church was to shew that the praise of God was to be told forth, not in languages known only to the learned, such as Greek and Latin and Syriac, but in the rough native dialect of "devout men, out of every nation under heaven" [Acts ii. 5] who were present at Jerusalem at the first Christian Pentecost. St. Paul affirms the same thing. Corinth had become once more the busy mart that it had been from the time of Thucydides [i. 13] till its destruction by Mummius [B.C. 146]; it was a great thoroughfare for the races of the East and of the West, ὅδος καὶ διέξοδος πάντων ἀνθρώπων [Aristides]. Every language was heard in its streets; and the gift of tongues was of the highest importance there; but St. Paul was careful to restrain its exercise within the limits of practical utility, and his terms point clearly to the use of vernacular liturgies. "When thou shalt bless [εὐλογήσῃς] with the Spirit, how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks [τῇ σῇ εὐχαριστίᾳ], seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest?" [1 Cor. xiv. 16]. St. Paul had already applied the same terms in speaking of liturgical consecration; "The cup of blessing which we bless [τῆς εὐλογίας ὃ εὐλογοῦμεν], is it not the communion of the Blood of Christ?" [1 Cor. x. 26]. "The Lord Jesus, in the same night in which He was betrayed, took bread, and when He had given thanks [εὐχαριστήσας] He brake it" [1 Cor. xi. 23]. Chrysostom understands 1 Cor. xiv. 16 of priestly consecration, ἰδιώτην δὲ τὸν λαϊκὸν λέγει, and says that the laity would be deprived of a great privilege if deprived of their Amen, viz., the final Amen that closed the Eucharistic Service, οὐ γὰρ ἀκούων τὸ εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων ὅπερ ἐστὶ τέλος, οὐ λέγει τὸ Ἀμήν. It may be noted that the Liturgy of Antioch, which Chrysostom had in his mind, closed with the clause "for ever and ever, Amen." The liturgical use of the vernacular had become so common as to have passed into an abuse which the Apostle checked; all things were to be "done for edifying," and there could be no edification where the celebrant used words which the most part of the congregation could not understand. "He that hath no tongue, and he that hath none to be understood, is alike insignificant to me." [Bp. Taylor, Dissuasive, I. i. 8.] There was no violation of ecclesiastical analogy in the exhibition of more than one language, if necessary, in public service; for St. Jerome records that at the funeral of Paula the Psalms were sung in Greek, Latin, and Syriac, because men from countries represented by those languages were there. [Hieron. ad Eustoch. Epitaph. Paulæ Matr. iv. p. 687.] In Wales, at the present day, the prayers are often in English, the sermon in Welsh.

Justin Martyr's account of the celebration is in keeping with the Apostle's words given above. Prayer being over, an offering is made of bread and wine and water, and forthwith the principal minister [ὁ προεστὼς] puts up prayers and thanksgivings [ἐυχὰς ὁμοίως καὶ εὐχαριστίας]; and these praises were fully "understanded of the people," for they "responded their assent [cf. ἄξιον καὶ δίκαιον], pronouncing the Amen" [καὶ ὁ λαὸς ἐπευφημεῖ λέγων τὸ Αμήν. Just. M. Apol. i. p. 98. Thirlby. Harvey, Vindex Catholicus, iii. 169.] There can be no doubt but that the venerable Martyr here made reference to a vernacular liturgy, and that the Amen was the congregational response at the end of the prayer of blessing as handed down to us in every existing liturgy. If it be conceded, contrary to all evidence, that St. Paul was not speaking of the celebration of the Eucharist, he was at any rate giving apostolical directions with respect to the decent performance of public worship; and he demands that it should be conducted in the vernacular language of the congregation, without which there could be no congregational worship. It is very certain that from the first the Scriptures were translated and the liturgy celebrated in the churches in the vernacular tongue. The pure Word of God has still been the light and guide of His people. Before the day of Christ the Jewish Church was careful to set the law before the people of God in their own language; and the Church of Christ has not been less careful of the eternal interest of her children. The Scriptures were speedily translated into Latin and Syriac [Orig. c. Cels. viii. 37]: and as the preaching of the Cross was carried further, we find that both a version of the Scriptures and a vernacular liturgy were possessed by Egyptians, Ethiopians, Abyssinians, Armenians, Goths, Sclavonic tribes, and Anglo-Saxons. Cassiodorus explains the words of the Psalmist, "She shall be brought to the king in raiment of divers colours" [Psa. xlv. 14], of the diversities of language in the Church, in which the praises of God were sung; "Linguas multipliees signifieat; quia omnis gens secundum suam patriam in Ecclesia psallit auctori."

The precise words of our Liturgy are met with in different sections of the Primitive Church, and in various languages [Cyril Hieros. Catech. Myst. v. 4. Cypr. de Or. Dom. 19. Harvey's Eccl. Angl. Vind. Apost. ii. 90, iii. 308. See also Hilar. in Ps. lxv.]. The pure Word of God is the guide of His people now, as the Law was a light to His people of old. And as the Jewish Church was careful to make the Law and the Prophets familiar to the people by means of vernacular translations, so it is owing to the motherly care of the Church in these later days that her children are nourished with the pure Word of God in their own language. Chrysostom, in his homily at the close of a Gothic service, declared that it was a mark of true faith in the Church to place barbarian and Greek on the same level by means of a vernacular liturgy. [Chrys. xii. 512, ed. Bened. Paris, 1838.] And the Church of England nowhere establishes her high Apostolic mission more clearly than when she prescribes that the Holy Scriptures and the prayers shall be read, and the Sacraments administered in English. It is not meant that no church can be Apostolical that does not adopt the same course, though it be a thing plainly repugnant to the Word of God and the custom of the Primitive Church to deviate from it; if prayers be in a dead language translation may give to them a living power. But a church that takes care that Scripture, Liturgy and Sacraments are brought home to the intelligence of the people in their vernacular tongue is discharging its office in the spirit of the Apostle, who declared that he would rather speak five words in the Church with the understanding, that he might edify others, "than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue" [1 Cor. xiv. 19. Ussher, de Scr. et Sacr. Vernac. Bp. Browne on Art. XXIV. Palmer's Antiq. of Eng. Ritual, iv. 15. Bingham, Ant. xiii. 4. Horne, Introd. vol. II. i. 2. Bishop Taylor, Dissuasive, I. i. 7.]

VERSIONS. The different versions of Scripture may be classed as: [1] those that were made directly from the Hebrew; [2] daughters of the Septuagint translation; [3] the Latin Vulgate; and [4] daughters of the Vulgate.

I. In the order of Providence the way was prepared for the evangelization of the world by the publication of the LXX. Version. The title of "Christ the Lord" first opens upon us in its pages. Πνεῦμα προσώπου ἡμῶν Χριστὸς Κύριος [Lam. iv. 20]. Commerce consequent upon conquest had made the Greek language universal when Christ appeared, and no religion could be of Catholic acceptance that was not conveyed in a Greek form. The LXX. was composed when Hebrew was still a living language.

The true history of the Septuagint translation is lost. The name is generally traced back to the mythical relation of Aristeas, which, till the time of Jerome and even afterwards, met with implicit credence. The oft-told tale need not be repeated. It was first discredited by Jerome [Præf. in Pent. Ep. civ.]. In modern times the story was rejected by Ludovicus Vives [in August. Civ. Dei. xviii. 42]; while its flimsiness has been exposed by Scaliger [Eus. Chron.], Fabricius [Bibl. Gr.], and with more minute learning by Hody [de Text. Bibl. Orig. i]. The Jewish records are not silent upon the subject. The Jerusalem Talmud contents itself with affirming that the version was executed by order of Ptolemy without entering into detail; the Mechilta, an exegetical work of the first century, says the same thing; but the Babylonian Talmud speaks of the seventy-two elders placed in separate cells, and translating the Law by King Ptolemy's command; when "The Ever Blessed put understanding into each man's heart, so that one and all gave the same meaning" [Talm. Bab. Megilla 9, B]. Philo, after recounting the same story, adds that a yearly festival was instituted at Alexandria similar to the Feast of Tabernacles in honour of the event; though a later Talmudic hand [Taanith, 50, B] records that the day, eighth Thebet, was kept as a fast, and as a day of affliction no less bitter than that which commemorated the golden calf in Horeb [Sopherim, i. 7]; also that a three days' darkness gave evidence of the Divine wrath. The version was seen to be a bright weapon in the armoury of the Church, and Jewish opinion had then changed. There is doubtless a nucleus of truth in the story. The LXX. very possibly originated at Alexandria from the religious requirements of the Jewish settlers, and obtained its name from the Great Sanhedrin of seventy-two members, including Nasî and Ab Beth Dîn, under whose direction it may have been made. The Law was first translated under the two first Ptolemies. The Talmudic treatise Sopherim [c. i.] says that the version of the Law was made by five elders in the time of King Ptolemy; each book of the Law having perhaps been entrusted to a separate scribe. The style of the five books, to which that of Joshua may be added, exhibits unity of plan and identity of age; yet there is sufficient variation to shew that it was not the work of one man. Ewald does not discredit the idea that the version may have emanated from the wish of Ptolemy II. to add the Jewish Law to the collection of national codes that he made, as Plutarch informs us [Volk Isr. iv. 326].

Accounts vary with respect to the particular reign in which the Septuagint version was commenced. The Talmud and patristical authority are in favour of Ptolemy Soter, the son of Lagus, founder of the dynasty; while Aristeas, Philo, and Josephus say that the translation was made by order of his son Ptolemy Philadelphus. It may have been executed during the two years of joint administration [B.C. 285-286]. The Babylonian Talmud allows to it a certain degree of divine direction, if not of inspiration. Both Talmuds also observed certain discrepancies between the translation and the original in thirteen places. Only four of these hold good as regards the modern text [Gen. ii. 2]; where God is said to have completed the work of creation on the sixth day, whereas Moses included the Sabbath, as also among the number of things created. In Exod. xii. 40, after "Egypt" the LXX. Version inserts καὶ ἐν γῇ Χαναάν [Talm., "and in other countries"], to make better work of the chronology [see Bishop Wordsworth's note and Gal. iii. 17]; the Samaritan Pentateuch also agrees with the LXX. [Numb. xvi. 15] "I have not taken from thee an ass" [חמור]; where the LXX. have ἐπιθύμημα [חמור], "objet d'agrément." In Lev. xi. 6, for "hare" the LXX. have δασύποδα, as the Talmud says, "Lest the King should think that they made a jest of the name" [Lagus]. These instances of divergence, it may be remarked, were taken exclusively from the Pentateuch.

A Greek version of portions of the Pentateuch is indicated yet earlier than the date of the Ptolemies [Aristobulus, quoted by Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 410, ed Potter, and by Eusebius, Præp. Ev. ix. 6, and xiii. 12], and an account of the history and legislation of Moses may very possibly have existed in a Greek form before the entire Pentateuch was translated, towards the close of the third century B.C. The first evidence that we have of the completion of the rest of the sacred books is contained in the preface to the Book of Wisdom, which speaks of a Greek version of "the Law and the Prophets and other Books" as already existing when the Son of Sirach wrote in the thirty-eighth year of Ptolemy Euergetes, i.e. about 130 B.C. It may be inferred, therefore, that they were completed after the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and before that of Ptolemy Physcon or Euergetes II. The only translator's name on record is that of Lysimachus at the end of the Book of Esther, who translated it in the reign of Ptolemy. It has been said that if the version of the Book of Job be as recent as the concluding words, it must have been written after the commencement of the Christian era, "Job died in old age, and full of days; and it is written that he shall rise again with those whom the Lord doth raise" [xlii. 17]. But the words are in exact keeping with the faith in a resurrection of the just enounced by the seven martyred brethren in the Second Book of Maccabees [c. vii.], and may well have been written in the time of the Great Synagogue [see also LXX. Psa. i. 5, xlix. 15; Job xix. 26; Isa. xxvi. 19].

The language of the LXX. is the Hellenistic Greek of Alexandria, based upon the Attic dialect. Egypt was evidently the land of its birth. Peculiarities of the version place the ancient readings of the copy clearly before the mind's eye. Faulty division shews a continuously written line without spacing the words. The finial letters מנצפך were not yet in use [1 Chron. xvii. 10; Psa. xiii. 6, 7, xliv. 5, cvi. 5; Isa. i. 26, 27; Hos. vi. 3, 5; Zech. xi. 2]. Also the text was unpointed [Gen. xv. 11; Exod. xii. 17; Numb. xvi. 5; Deut. xv. 18; Isa. ix. 8, xxiv. 23], as seen everywhere in proper names. The chronology of the LXX. varies from the dead reckoning of the Hebrew by the addition of about 1500 years to the years A.M. down to the call of Abraham; a calculation that is now generally received [Walton's Proleg.]. The Samaritan text here, as in Exod. xii. 40, agrees with the LXX.; as do the more ancient historians quoted by Josephus, viz., Demetrius Phalereus, who, however, had certainly seen the Pentateuch in LXX., the elder Philo, and Eupolemus,[1] to whom also the LXX. version of Job was known. The historian Alexander referred the Deluge to 2284 A.M., and from thence to the Exodus he reckoned 1340 years. A desire is plainly observable in the LXX. translators to tone down the rougher instances of anthropopathia in the Hebrew Scriptures [cf. Exod. xxiv. 10; Frankel, Vorstud. 174, 179]; and accommodate its language to the pro-cosmic ideas of Plato [Franck, Etudes Or. 290; Herzfeld, Gesch. d. V. Isr. Excurs. 27, sec. 1; compare in LXX., Gen. i. 2, ii. 4, 5, with Wisd. xi. 17].

The LXX. is the parent of every ancient version of Scripture, with the exception of the Syriac Peshito, and the Samaritan. It was the sole standard of authority during the first four centuries, and has been the Bible of the Eastern Church from the very first. The language of the New Dispensation is one with this version of the Old, which has stereotyped the truth of the Gospel till "tongues shall cease." It has always been as Chrysostom termed it, πύλη τῶν ἐθνῶν, the gate of Gentile access to Christ.

Without maintaining with Philo, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Augustine, the plenary inspiration of the LXX. version, we may reasonably believe that the minds of the writers were controlled; and that words having a certain sense in Attic Greek, the basis of the Macedonian dialect, received through the Spirit of Wisdom a new adjustment in the language of religion, and acquired their destined bearing from the deep truths of revelation. Such are the following words:—Ἀγαπητὸς, ἁγιασμὸς, ᾅδης, αἴρειν τὰς ἁμαρτίας, αἰώνιος, ἄφεσις, διάβολος, διαθήκη, δικαιοσύνη, δικαίωσις, δοξὰ, ἐκκλησία, ἐντυγχάνειν, εὐχαριστεῖν, θυσία, ἱλασμὸς, καρδία, κτίζειν, κύριος, λύτρωσις, μεσίτης, μετάνοια, μονογενὴς, ξύλον, παντοκράτωρ, πέτρα, πίστις, πνεῦμα, σὰρξ, σκάνδαλον, σκηνόω, σωτὴρ, Χριστὸς, ψυχή.

[1] 140 B.C.; see Euseb. Præp. Ev. ix. 17, 26, 30-34, 39, and compare the fragments from the Jewish writer Artapanus, ib. 18, 23, 27; Demetrius, 150 B.C., ib. 21, 29, and Aristeas, ib. 25, all of which are taken from the work of Polyhistor Alexander, 90-80 B.C.

The use made of the LXX. in the New Testament has rendered it very precious to the Church. Of three hundred and fifty direct quotations from the Old Testament, scarcely fourteen per cent. differ materially from the Septuagint.[1] Of thirty-seven quotations ascribed to our Saviour, thirty-three agree almost verbatim with the LXX.; two follow the Hebrew and differ from the LXX.; one agrees with neither, and another partly with both [Grinfield, Apol. for LXX. 31]. In the speech of St. Stephen there are nearly thirty quotations from the LXX. The Ethiopian eunuch was converted by reading the LXX. All the quotations in the Acts of the Apostles are taken from this version, and wherever the word γραφὴ occurs, it means the LXX. The epistles of St. James and St. Peter being addressed to Hellenists by birth, are fully furnished with quotations from the LXX. St. Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles, and deeply versed in the Hebrew Scriptures, yet quotes the LXX. on all occasions. His first and longest address in the synagogue at Pisidia is full of allusions to the LXX. His vocabulary is wholly supplied from the same source, and this is no less true of the immediate successors of the Apostles. Timothy, of Hellenistic parentage, could only have been instructed in the LXX. version [2 Tim. iii. 15].

In the third century two recensions of the LXX. were extant. The ancient text preserved in libraries and churches; and a common or κοινὴ[2] edition, altered by accident, or private whim, and liberally interpolated from the margin. Origen took upon himself the task of purifying it.[3] He arranged the Tetrapla in four parallel columns, containing the versions of Aquila and Symmachus; the former rendered "verbum e verbo," with servile minuteness, the latter "sensum e sensu," with a freer hand [Hierom. in Job]. A third column contained the κοινὴ, and in the last column was the version of Theodotion. To these were added the Hebrew text in Hebrew, and the same in Greek characters, which thus formed the Hexapla. Origen made the κοινὴ square with the Hebrew text, by marking redundancies with an "obelus," and supplying deficiencies from other versions, principally from that of Theodotion; noting his insertions with an asterisk.[4] [Jerom. Comm. in Dan. Præf.]

Three other imperfect versions having been discovered by Origen, were added afterwards. The Hexapla was too voluminous for any practical use, and it remained in the library at Cæsarea till its destruction by the Arabs [A.D. 653]. In the fourth century Eusebius and Pamphilus republished the κοινὴ, as the most familiar to the people, using the diacritical marks of Origen; these, however, became displaced and intermixed, or were altogether omitted, and the only result of Origen's labour was to leave the text in a far worse condition than before. Very nearly at the same time, Lucian the Martyr published, at Constantinople, a recension, which was partly a re-translation. Hesychius, an Egyptian presbyter, performed a similar work at Alexandria, making a liberal use of the later Greek versions [Ernesti. 15]. From the intermixture of all these elements of error, with the addition of others from unknown versions, the original text of the Alexandrian version is gone past recovery. Jerome says of these various recensions, "Alexandria et Ægyptus in LXX. suis Hesychium laudat auctorem. Constantinoplis usque Antiochiam Luciani Martyris exemplaria probat. Mediæ inter has provinciæ Palæstinos legunt codices, quos ab Origene elaboratos Eusebius et Pamphilus vulgaverunt, totusque orbis hac inter se contraria varietate pugnat" [Comm. in Dan. Præf.]

The principal MSS. of the Septuagint Version are the Codex Alexandrinus [A]; the Codex Vaticanus [B]; and the Codex Sinaiticus [ℵ]. Each of these three will be found described in a separate article. The fragmentary Codex Cottonianus [Evv] of the British Museum is the most ancient as yet known. It was considered by Dr. Holmes to have been the most correct and valuable of all the MSS., agreeing perfectly with no other text of the LXX., and representing, as he imagined, Origen's Tetraplar copy. The Codex Ambrosianus, in the Milan Library, and the Codex Coislinianus of the Paris collection, are both of the seventh century.

The Ephraem Rescript [C], or 9 of the Imperial Library, Paris, fourth or fifth century, contained only the five poetical books, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon, written stichometrically, similar to [A] and in beautiful character. It also had the Books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus. The Book of Psalms is now entirely gone. Job is reduced to nineteen leaves, Proverbs to six, Ecclesiastes to eight, the Song of Solomon to one, Wisdom to seven, and Ecclesiasticus to twenty-three.

[1] Josephus quotes this version frequently; in Philo's works there are upwards of two thousand referenees, single or repetitive, chiefly from the Law.

[2] Κοινὴ was also the term employed by Alexandrian critics to distinguish the old unrevised text of Homer, before the application of grammatical διορθώσεις. Possibly the parallel fabrications of the seventy interpreters and the seventy learned men employed by Pisistratus to revise the text of Homer were forged on the same anvil.

[3] For original sources of information see Origen, Ep. ad Africanum, p. 16 in Matt. tom. xv., Opp. iii. 672. Jerom. in Tit. iii., Præf. in Paralip.; Ep. ad Suniam et Fretetam. Epiphanius, de Pond. et Mens. 18, 19. A collection of the Hexaplar fragments was first made by Morinus (not, as is generally stated, Nobilius) in the Sixtine edition, and Drusius, A.D. 1662. The careful edition of Montfaucon, Par. A.D. 1714, was condensed by Bahrdt, A.D. 1769. The Tetraplar version of Daniel (LXX.) was published [A.D. 1772] by the Propaganda from the Chisian Codex.

[4] These marks were already in use with classical grammarians to distinguish faulty passages.

The Ephraem Reseript, oeeupying a middle plaee between [A] and [B], is nearly of the same register as the Alexandrian and the Cottonian MSS. It eontains 209 leaves, i.e. 64 Old Testament, 145 New Testament, with forty-one lines to the page, and forty letters to the full line. The original writing was removed to give plaee to a work of Ephraem Syrus in Greek, but it has been restored by the Jobertine tineture. It was printed by Tisehendorf in 1843, Leipsie, in eapitals, eaeh page being a eounterpart of the original as to lines and letters; missing leaves also being noted in the paging. The MS., as may be supposed, is mueh stained by the ehemieals employed upon it, but it is perfeetly legible.

The prineipal editions are [a] the Complutensian, forming a eolumn of the Complutensian Polyglott [Alcala], whieh has the Hebrew, Targum, and Vulgate in three other eolumns [A.D. 1515-1517]. It diverges so frequently from all known MSS., to approaeh more nearly to the Hebrew, that till lately it had beeome "suspeete." It is now known that those approximations agree with the Hexaplar Syriae, and therefore very possibly it may represent the original Hexaplar text. Simon says that Cardinal Ximenes obtained his eorreetions from the Vulgate; but its MS. sourees are not known with eertainty, and they may represent some unknown Codex. Laeunæ seem to have been filled in from the Venetian MS. of Cardinal Bessarion and from that of Cardinal Carafa. The same text was adopted in the Antwerp Polyglott [A.D. 1572], in the Commelinian [Heidelberg, A.D. 1599], Hamburg, A.D. 1596, very rare, and Parisian, A.D. 1645.

[b] The Venetian or Aldine [A.D. 1518] expresses apparently a eollated text from later MSS., with replaeements from Theodotion, and oeeasional interpolations from Aquila's version. It gave the text to Cratander's edition [Basle, A.D. 1520]; the Strasburg edition [A.D. 1526]; Seeond Basle [A.D. 1545] with Melanehthon's prefaee; Third Basle by Brylinger [A.D. 1550]; Frankfort [A.D. 1597]; Veniee [A.D. 1687]; and generally to the editions published in Germany.

[c] The Roman or Sixtine edition [A.D. 1586] was printed professedly from the Vatiean Codex, but the readings were plentifully and not very sagaeiously altered. Portions that were missing in [B] were supplied from other MSS., prineipally from the eognate Codex Venetus, that of Cardinal Carafa, and others in the Mediean eolleetion at Florence. The eostly edition of Holmes and Parsons [A.D. 1798-1827] professedly exhibits this text; but Mai's reprint of the Vatiean Codex reduees the eritieal authority of this edition to zero. Holmes, however, made a vast number of eollations, whieh remain, in many volumes, in the Bodleian Library; and his prolegomena form a valuable addition to the literature of the LXX. The reprint of [B] by Cardinal Mai is not so free from error as might have been expeeted, and differs materially from the Sixtine edition, which is now rendered worthless in a eritieal point of view. The Cardinal has unfortunately printed the missing portions of [B] in the same type with the rest; but the Book of Daniel from the Codex Chisianus is correetly printed in small type. The Sixtine edition has been the text most usually followed in modern reprints.

[d] Grabe's edition, professedly from [A] [A.D. 1707-1720], is not an exaet eopy, many editorial eorreetions having been made, partly from inferior MSS., partly eonjeetural. The prolegomena are valuable. Its daughters are the edition of Breitinger [A.D. 1730-1732], with readings from the Vatiean and other MSS.; and Reineeci's Tetraglott [A.D. 1750].

[e] The Greek text of Walton's Polyglott was formed on the Sixtine with var. lect. from [A]. The work was earelessly exeeuted. [f] Bishop Pearson's poeket edition [Cambr. A.D. 1665], also a Sixtine text, is valuable only for its prolegomena. [g] The edition of Bos [Franeq. A.D. 1709] is the same text, with the var. lect. of Walton. [h] The Leipsie edition of Van Ess [A.D. 1824] and [i] the Oxford edition by Professor Gaisford are also Sixtine, with readings at the foot from [A]. [k] Tisehendorf's editions, founded on the Sixtine, have freshness, the results of his own discoveries being reeorded. His prolegomena also are most valuable and suggestive for any future reeension. [l] Mr. Field's edition, exeeuted for the Soeiety for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and "aeeording to order," was designed for religious use in the Eastern Church, but does violenee to the text in bringing it into agreement with the Hebrew, verbally as well as formally. It is of the [A] stock, being based upon the Moseow reprint of Grabe's text. [m] Spohn's Jeremiah is an attempt to restore the Hexaplar text of that prophet.

A great work remains to be aehieved, and one for whieh no single life would suffiee; a really good and eritieal edition of the LXX., that should restore as nearly as may be the original text, on the basis of [1] a thorough re-examination and sifting of MS. evidenee, extending also to any marginal seholia; [2] a similar investigation of the quotations in the New Testament; [3] the same as regards Philo and the Fathers; [4] the evidenee of eatenæ eonveniently digested and registered; [5] versions and glossaries.

Conferenda: [1] Historical Treatises. Usher, Syntagma de LXX. Interpr.; Grabe, de Var. Vit. LXX.; Fabrieius, Bibl. Gr. ii.; Hody, de Bibl. Text Orig.; Dr. Brett on the Anc. Vers.; Dähne, Jud. Al. Phil.; Churton, Norr. Prize Essay; Grinfield, Apol. for LXX.; Prideaux, Conn.; Ewald, Volk Isr. iv. 322, 3d ed.

[2] Prolegomena. Walton, Polygl.; Pearson to LXX.; Montfaueon to Hexapla; Holmes to LXX.; Tisehendorf; Bos, LXX.

[3] Introductions to Old Testament. Eiehhorn; Carpzov; De Wette; Hug; Häverniek; Davidson; Horne.

[4] Critical. Cappelli, Crit. Sacr.; Huet, Origeniana; Fiseher, Prolusiones; Valesius, in Eus. H. E. vi. 16; Sehleusner, Opusc. Crit.; Kennieott, Diss. Gen.; Valekenaer, Diatribe de Aristob. Jud.; Franekel, Vorstudien zu der LXX. and Ueber d. Einfluss d. LXX.; Credner, Gesch. d. Canons; Amersfoodt, De Var. Lect.; Holmes; Ernesti, Opusc. Crit.; Prof. Selwyn, Notæ Criticæ and Horæ Hebr.

[5] Articles. Prof. Selwyn's Art. on LXX. in Smith's Dict. of the Bible; articles in Herzog, Bibel-Uebers; and in the Kirchen Lexicon, Alex. Uebers; Franck, Dict. d. Sciences Philos.; Eichhorn's Repertorium; Ersch und Gruber, Hexapla; Herzfeld, Gesch. d. Volk. Isr. Excurs. 28; Articles in the Christian Remembrancer, Dec. 1859, Jan. and Apr. 1861, Oct. 1862, Apr. 1863; and in the Journal of Sacr. Lit., July 1855, Jan. 1857, April 1858.

[1.] At the head of all other direct versions stand the TARGUMIM, to which a separate article is given. [2.] A Samaritan version, made from the Samaritan recension of the Pentateuch by Nathaniel, as Gesenius supposes [de Pent. Sam. p. 18, note. Winer, de Vers. Sam. indole, p. 9], high priest of the Samaritans shortly before the Christian era. Walton refers it back to the first years of the temple on Mount Gerizim under Manasseh. [3.] The Syriac Peshito, i.e. "simple," the correlative term of "figurative," or "paraphrastic," is one of the most ancient versions of Scripture. It is generally referred to the second century [Wiseman, Hor. Syr. 131-136], and appears to bear the mark of several hands; in some few cases Jewish, but for the most part Christian, for Psa. lv. 14 is explained of the Holy Eucharist; Messianic passages also in the Prophets have a Christian complexion. It comprises all the canonical books of the Old Testament, but not the Apocrypha, which exist in a separate version as used by Ephrem Syrus. It often agrees, probably by interpolation, with the Targum Jonathan on the Prophets [Wiseman, Hor. Syr. 102]. Although canonical authority was allowed to the Peshito, yet the Syrians of Palestine had a preference for the LXX.; and as the Divine inspiration of the Greek version was fully credited, the Peshito by direct correction or by marginal interpolation was made to approximate to the LXX. readings, chiefly of the [A] recension. Gregory Barhebræus allows that he made such corrections, and Jacob of Edessa, A.D. 700, altered it by the Syro-Hexaplar copies. This version has supplied valuable readings to Kennicott and De Rossi [Wette, Einl.]. The Peshito first appeared in the Paris Polyglott, with lacunæ filled in by translation from the Vulgate. It also forms part of the London Poyglott. Both of these texts are very faulty. The first tolerable edition is that of Dr. Lee, A.D. 1823, executed for the Bible Society [Hävernick, Einl.]. The Nestorians retained the ancient recension of the Peshito; but [4.] the Monophysites in the tenth century set up one of their own, termed the Karkuph, or "hill" recension, named probably from the place of its preparation, the Jacobite convent on Mount Sigara. Cardinal Wiseman [Hor. Syr. i. 236-240] has shewn that it has for its basis the Peshito, but with a different arrangement of the books, and forced into something like harmony with Greek orthography by a peculiar system of punctuation. There is a valuable MS. of this version in the Vatican.

Three Arabic versions were made from the Hebrew text: [5.] That of Rabbi Saadias Gaon, who died A.D. 942, which, notwithstanding its Targum-like character, throws much light upon obscure passages. Its original compass is unknown. [See S. Munk, Notice sur R. Saadias Gaon.] [6.] A version of Joshua; and [7.] the Pentateuch (Arabs Erpenii) published by Van Erpen. Arabic versions, also from the Hebrew, exist; [8.] one, in the Bodleian collection, of the Psalms, formerly Dr. Pococke's property, and [9.] another at Mannheim of Genesis. [10.] A Persian version is mentioned by Chrysostom [Hom. ii. in Joh.] and Theodoret [Gr. Aff. i. 5]. [11.] A version entirely sui generis is preserved in the Library of St. Mark at Venice [Cod. vii.], made direct from the Hebrew, as may be seen by the var. lect. that are indicated. It is a Greek MS. of the fourteenth century, and the version appears to have been made in the Middle Ages at Byzantium. It applies all the preceding Greek versions, though apparently under rabbinical guidance. This Codex contains 302 leaves of parchment in long quarto, and is written in the Oriental manner as regards paging, i.e. it begins from the right hand. It is moreover divided into the synagogal Parashahs for Sabbath readings. It consists of Pentateuch, the Hagiographa, (less the Psalms,) Lamentations and Daniel, all of which have been edited. It is apparently the copy of a mutilated MS. of older date. As another peculiarity, the translator expresses the rougher Chaldee portions by the broad Doric dialect. An attempt at extreme elegance and refinement is often found in it side by side with the grossest barbarisms. It was printed at Strasburg, A.D. 1784, and the Pentateuch by Ammon at Erlangen, A.D. 1790, 1791.

II. The Divine inspiration of the Septuagint was so completely believed by the Syrian Church in Palestine that translations were made from it at various times. The so called "Figurata" in Syriac is now known to have had no existence. The Syriac word that usually means "figure," means "text" when applied to the Scriptures [Assem, B. O. III. i. 146]. Hence, the passage of Abulfaragi rendered "the figurata according to the translation of the LXX.," means really, "the text or version according," &c. This then may be placed out of the account, but the following exist:

[1.] A version made at Alexandria from the Tetraplar text [Eichhorn, Repertor. iii. 186, viii. 96], A.D. 617, by Paul, Bishop of Tela, in the Monophysite interest.

[2.] The Philoxenian version of the New Testament was made by a presbyter named Polycarp under the direction of Philoxenus, Bishop of Hierapolis, or Mabug [A.D. 488-518]. Portions also of the Old Testament were translated. The Milan MS. of the Hexaplar version of Isaiah refers to "another version made for the Syrians by the holy Philoxenus, Bishop of Mabug" [de Wette, Einl.]; and in fact a Philoxenian fragment of Isaiah is now in course of publication by Ceriani, who is also editing the Syriac translation of Paul of Tela, with specimens of the revision by James of Edessa from the Peshito. The Heraclean, or Harelensian, version can only be treated as mythical, so far as the Old Testament is concerned; neither is the Heraclean New Testament anything more than a recension of the Philoxenian. A Philoxenian Psalter was cited by Moses of Aghel in the sixth century.

The Gothic version of Ulfila [A.D. 388], Bishop of the West Goths on the Lower Danube, was made from the LXX., and would have been of considerable critical importance, to judge by the portions of the New Testament that have come down to us. These express with fidelity the nicer shades of thought of the Greek originals, disclosing the germ of the characteristic excellence of the German language. Traces of working from a Latin text were very probably interpolated as corrections from the margin. Chrysostom seems to allude to this version in his Homily, "Postquam presbyter Gothus concionatus fuerat" [Harvey, Vindex Catholicus, iii. 135-136]. It comprehended the whole of the Old Testament with the exception of the Book of Kings, the Gothic kings having been thought to be already too warlike [Philostorg. ii. 5]; the only portions preserved are Psa. liii. 2, 3; Esth. ii. 8-42; Neh. v. 13-18, vi. 14-19, vii. 1-3. The New Testament version contains, in a fragmentary condition, the four Gospels, taken by the Swedes in the Thirty Years' War from Prague to Upsala, and known as the "Codex Argenteus," written in silver characters; fragments of the Epistle to the Romans were discovered in a palimpsest at Wolfenbüttel, while others have come to light at Milan, representing the Pauline Epistles, with the exception of the Epistle to the Hebrews. The entire collection, with an Apparatus Philol. Crit. appeared at Leipsic, A.D. 1843-1846. [See G. Waitz, Leben des Ulfila, and W. Krafft, K. G. der Germ. Völker, i. 1.]

[3.] The Ethiopic version is written in the sacred language, or Ghîz of Axuma, from which the Amharic, or spoken dialect, has long since drifted away. It was made from the LXX., according to the Alexandrian recension, at the end of the fourth, or beginning of the fifth century, but it often makes a clear approximation to the Hebrew. It is referred by tradition to the Abba Salâma, i.e. Frumentius, the Apostle of Abyssinia; but more than one hand may be traced in it; and, in fact, the Abyssinian calendar connects its nine principal saints with the composition. Chrysostom mentions this version [Hom. ii. in Joh. p. 561, Eton ed.]. The arrangement of the books is peculiar; there are four classes: 1. The Law; Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Ruth: 2. The Kings; the historical books, Ezra, Tobit, Judith, Esther, Job, Psalms: 3. Solomon; Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Ecclesiasticus, Wisdom: 4. The Prophets; the entire body, with Baruch, Lamentations, and the two Books of Maccabees. MSS. of the entire version exist in Europe, and separate portions have been printed. Perfect copies are rare even in Abyssinia; but Bruce brought back one, which is preserved in the Bodleian Library. As in the case of many other versions from the LXX., its parentage is the only thing that gives to it any value; and it may yet render good service to future editors. Walton's Polyglott, in general carelessly executed, is equally so in the Ethiopic. [See T. P. Platt's Catalogue of the Ethiopic Bibl. MSS.; Bib. Soc.]

Three Egyptian versions exist, [4.] one in the Coptic, or Memphitic dialect of Lower Egypt; [5.] the other in the Sahidic, or Thebaic dialect of the upper country. It does not appear which is the most ancient, but both are in accordance with the Alexandrian, or Hesychian recension, and therefore may date about the end of the third century. The vast influx of monks into Egypt at this time [Monasticism], whose rules were written by Pachomius, himself ignorant of Greek, in the Egyptian tongue, indicates an early version of Scripture in the vernacular of the monks. Only fragments more or less extensive of the Coptic (Pentateuch, Psalms, Jeremiah, Daniel), and a few of the Sahidic version have been published. As indicating particular readings in the LXX. they also have their use. [6.] The Basmuric version is similar to the Sahidic, but with a tinge of the Coptic. A codex exists in the Imperial Collection at Paris.

[7.] Misrobinvented for the Armenians an alphabet, A.D. 410, and translated the Bible from some mixed text of the LXX., which it closely rendered. Its general agreement is with the [A] recension.

[8.] At the close of the same century the Georgian alphabet was founded upon the Armenian; and in the sixth, young men of promise were sent to be trained in Greece, who on their return translated the Scriptures into Georgian from the LXX. The New Testament, Psalms, and Prophets were printed at Tiflis in the beginning of the century; and afterwards the entire Bible was published, A.D. 1743, at Moscow in folio, but altered to suit the received Sclavonic version.

[9.] The Sclavic version, said to have been made from the LXX. in the ninth century, was more probably a daughter of the Vulgate, corrected by Greek MSS. in the fourteenth century.

[10.] Several Arabic translations also have been made from the LXX.; as the texts of the Prophets, Psalms, and the writings of Solomon, in the Paris and London Polyglotts, the work of the tenth century, and from the Hexaplar text.

[11.] A Psalter, edited at Rome, A.D. 1614, is from the Alexandrian recension; which was the source also of the twelfth Melchite Psalter of the orthodox Syrian Church. Various Arabic translations exist in MS.

[12.] The old Itala version was made from the LXX. into Latin in the earliest period of the Christian Church; probably in the first century, but scarcely for Roman use; for Greek was then the general language. The extensive way in which the Roman Law was studied in North Africa caused that province to be more Roman in its language than Rome itself [see art. on North African Ch. in Dr. Smith's Dict. of Chr.

Antiq.]. These facts give probability to the idea of Eichhorn [Einl. S. 320-323], that the old Itala version was a product of North Africa, and its barbarous Latinity favours the assumption. The name "Itala" occurs only in Augustine [de Doctr. Chr. ii. 11]; "in ipsis autem translationibus Itala cæteris præfertur." Bentley conjectures "illa" for Itala; while by a yet more ingenious correction Bishop Potter proposes "usitata," the first syllable of which may easily have been absorbed in the ὁμοιοτέλευτον preceding, and then "itata" became "itala" [see Monk's Life of Bentley, 433]. Jerome calls this version "usitata," also the "common," like the LXX. κοινή, from whence it was prepared, and the "old," as distinguished from his own Vulgate recension, but never "Itala." It agrees more closely with the Vatican than with the other MSS. of the Septuagint. Its "disjecta membra" have been collected together in several works, of which that by the Benedictine P. Sabatier is the most complete. The Book of Job, the Psalms, and some of the deutero-canonical books, are still extant in the Itala version; of the other books only fragments remain in patristical quotations, missals, breviaries, and in no small number in the more ancient juridical text-books [Münter, Misc. Hafniens. ii. 89; and Corp. Jur. ante-Justinian].

III. In the time of Jerome the Latin version had shared the fate of the LXX. text in the preceding ages [Hieron. Præf. in Josh.; Aug. Ep. 88, ad Hieron. and Ep. 97; De Doctr. Chr. ii. 11], and had become debased by the many partial versions of Scripture that existed, and by the established practice of translating from the Greek "pro re nata." Augustine urged Jerome to undertake a recension of the Latin version from the LXX., which he took in hand A.D. 382. He first completed the New Testament, and then prepared "cursim" the Roman Psalter; this was worked out by him afresh, and with more care, with the aid of Origen's Hexapla, and became the Gallican Psalter [Hieron. Præf. Post. in Ps. Apol. c. Ruff. ii. 24, Ep. 23, ad Lucin. 135, ad Sunn. et Fret.]. He then performed the same work on the other books of the Old Testament. Both Psalters and Job have been printed [Martianay, Hieron. Bibl. Div. Op. i. 1186 f.]; the other books have perished, or have been absorbed by the Vulgate.

[13.] While Jerome was engaged upon his recension of the Itala [A.D. 382] he formed the design of making an entirely new Latin version, working in the old material wherever it was serviceable. He commenced this work A.D. 385, and completed it in the twentieth year from that date, dividing the text into cola and commata [Præf. in Es. Paralip. Josh.]. But the work was not uninterrupted, for he was a quick scribe; three days ["tridui opus," Præf. in Libr. Salom.] were sufficient for the translation of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Solomon's Song, and one for Tobit [Præf. in Tob.], though he had reason to repent his over-haste. As the four Books of Kings were required for a particular purpose, he began with these; then followed in order the Books of Solomon, Ezra, and Nehemiah, the Pentateuch, Joshua, Ruth, Judges, Chronicles; Tobit also, and Judith from the Chaldee; concluding with Daniel, Esther, and Jeremiah. He added the apocryphal appendices to these latter, but expressly pronounces against their genuineness, and marked them with the wonted obeli [Præf. in Paralip. Neem. Pent. Ps.]. The Psalter still remained according to Gallican use, liturgical application having made it familiar to the Latin Church. The apocryphal books of the old version were also retained. Jerome had an able coadjutor in a learned Jew, by whose aid he gained a competent knowledge of Hebrew, though he compares the toil to the hard grind of a mill; "cum me in hujus linguæ pistrinam inclusissem" [Præf. in Dan.]. His tutor's name was Barhanina, converted by his industrious tormentor Ruffinus into Barabbas [Hieron. Apol. c. Ruff. i. 12]. In the preface to his commentary on Ecclesiastes, he says that he followed no human authority, but while he faithfully rendered the Hebrew original he followed the Septuagint where they did not widely diverge, and had regard also to the parallel versions of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus. He obtained light in places "ex Arabico sermone et interdum Syro" [Præf. in Job.]. His new translation was read in churches as well as the old version. Gregory the Great [A.D. 584] says that he based his "moral exposition" of Job on the new version of Jerome; though he applied also the old translation, agreeably to the custom of the Roman See [Greg. M., Præf. Moral. in Job.]. The Western Churches in general followed the same example [Hävernick]. Isidore of Seville made use of the new version; as did Vincent of Lerins throughout his "Commonitorium." But the old difficulty recurred; it was impossible that the two versions should have a concurrent authority, and yet preserve their purity. Errors multiplied with the transcription of copies for the use of the churches, and glosses were admitted from the margin; so that it is as hopeless now to say what were the alterations made by Jerome as to define the Hexaplar text of Origen.

When the art of printing was discovered, the first work that proceeded from the press was the Vulgate, the editio princeps [Mazarin] being that of Guttenberg of Mentz. It bears no date, but the years A.D. 1452-1456 limit the range of probable variation. Eighteen copies of this Bible are known to be in existence, six in foreign libraries, and the remainder in England; six in private collections; the others at the Bodleian, Eton, and elsewhere. The first serious attempt to apply critical principles was made by Robert Stephens, who superintended the issue of eight editions, for which a careful collation of available MSS. was made. His best edition was the fourth of A.D. 1540. Fourteen good MSS. and three editions were collated for it; but it was a thankless service, and brought him into trouble. Within six years the Council of Trent declared the Vulgate text to be authentic, "et nemo illam reficere quovis prætextu audeat vel præsumat" [Conc. Trid. Sess. iv. Decr. 2]. It was an estopper of all private critical judgment, which Möhler rather thankfully acknowledges [Symbolik SS. 41, 42]. In the same session printers were cautioned, "ut posthac S. Scriptura, potissimum hæc Vetus Vulgata Editio, quam emendatissime imprimatur." Since subsequent editions, as that of Heutenius, A.D. 1547, and Antwerp, A.D. 1573, continued to shew a very discordant text, Pope Sixtus V. determined to put forth a correct edition of the Vulgate. He saw the proofs as they passed through the press, correcting them with his own hands; "nostra nos ipsi manu correximus" [Præf. in Ed. 1589, 1590]; and pronounced by a papal decree that the Vulgate so edited was to be esteemed, without any doubt or controversy, that which the Council of Trent had declared authentic; a stringent clause also was added against the publication of any text differing from this papal edition. But his fatherly care had not prevented the recurrence of errors innumerable; some of these were corrected before the final issue with pen and ink and pasted slips, with which some of the copies were, and many more were not, completed. From the first, therefore, this edition was a typographical discord, and it was soon known to be thoroughly unserviceable. Sixtus V. did not survive the year of publication, and his successor Urban VII. thought of suppressing the copies and issuing a fresh edition; but he was only Pope for twelve days, and the two next Popes, Gregory XIV. and Innocent IX., having soon died, it devolved upon Clement VIII. to supply a more trustworthy text for the service of the Church. The interdict upon all correction and alteration imposed by Sixtus V. was a difficulty, but Robert Bellarmine, then known only as a learned Jesuit, shewed himself equal to the occasion, and laid the blame of all blunders upon the printer. In the preface to the new edition, A.D. 1592, written by him, it was stated that Sixtus had decreed the suppression of the former edition, "revocandum censuit atque decrevit," but the promulgation of the decree had been anticipated by death. These editions of the Vulgate thus supply a memorable passage in the history of papal editorial infallibility. The Clementine edition forms the ground of all subsequent editions, the text being formed in varying proportions on the old Latin version, Jerome's first recension, and his subsequent retranslation from the Hebrew.

IV. The Vulgate has been the parent text of the Anglo-Saxon version made by Ælfric, Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 996-1006, or, which is more probable, by his namesake the abbot, under the primacy of Dunstan, half a century earlier [see Routh's Opusc. ii. 520]. He also translated into Anglo-Saxon the Books of Judith, Esther, Maccabees, and a portion of Kings. The Vulgate is shewn by Pfannkuche to have been the original from whence he translated [Art. in Götting. Bibl. d. neuesten Theol. Lit. iii. 616], but the means of judging are scanty, only the Pentateuch and portions of Joshua and Judges remaining [Bibl. Bodl.]. Alter agrees with Pfannkuche [Paulus, Memorab. vi. 190, viii. 194], and adduces Gen. viii. 4 in proof, where LXX. and its transcripts have "Montes Ararat," while the Vulgate has "Montes Armeniæ," and the Anglo-Saxon "ofer þa muntas Armenies londes." Another instance is shewn in Deut. x. 3, where the LXX. for שטים, read שלמים, and wrote ἐκ ξύλων ἀσήπτων, but the Vulgate follows the Hebrew, "de lignis Setim," and Anglo-Saxon copies the Vulgate "of Seðim treowum." Similarly, Ex. xii. 9-11, quoted in Ælfric's Homily for Easter [see Harvey's Vindex Cath. iii. 345], follows the Vulgate in its divergence from the LXX.; e.g. ver. 9, "crudum quid," where there is no τι in the Greek, but Anglo-Saxon has "nan þing hréw." The last word of the same verse is "vorabitis," omitted by LXX., but Anglo-Saxon has "etað;" ver. 10, "nec ex eo remanebit quicquam," Anglo-Saxon "ne his nan þing ne belife," the LXX. again omitting τι, and having ἀπολείψετε; same verse "si quid residuum fuerit," Anglo-Saxon "gif þær hwæt toláfe sy," but LXX. "τὰ δὲ ἀπολειπόμενα," and so forth to the end of the passage at "Þeos tíd is Godes færeld," where the Latin translation as given by the Vulgate is adopted, "est enim Phase, id est Transitus Domini," the LXX. having simply πάσχα ἐστὶ Κυρίου. At the close of the homily the writer reverts to his text, and exactly expresses the concluding verse with its vernacular translation, "Þeos tíd is geháten on Ebreiscum Pascha, þat is on Leden Transitus, and on Englisc Færeld." The quotation by the same writer from John iii. 1-15, in his Homily on Baptism [printed from the Cambr. MS. in Harvey's Vindex Cath. iii. 277], was evidently copied from the Lectionary; it follows the Vulgate, but makes slight alterations and additions. These marks of a Latin origin are given because it has been imagined, contrary to all likelihood, that Ælfric translated from the Greek texts. The Psalter, translated by Aldhelm, first Bishop of Sherborne, early in the eighth century, is from the Psalterium Gallicanum; and soon after Egbert, at Aldhelm's request, translated the four Gospels from copies introduced by Augustine from Rome, a codex of which is preserved in the National Collection. King Alfred is known to have left an unfinished Anglo-Saxon translation of the Psalms when he died, A.D. 900. The Heptateuch and the Book of Job, with the Gospel of Nicodemus and the fragments of Judith, in Anglo-Saxon, were published by Thwaites A.D. 1698. The only Biblical value of the Anglo-Saxon Scriptures is the light that they may throw on the text of the Vulgate, as it came forth from Rome in the second century after St. Jerome's death.

VIATICUM. [Reservation.]

VICARIOUS SACRIFICE. Christ was the fulfilment of every typical rite and institution of the Law—the very substance of truth—that gave their only significance to the sacrifices of the altar. "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world." As substance and shadow have a reciprocal relation, the material body projecting the shadow, and the shadow shaping out the body, so the sacrifices of the Temple and the sacrifice of the Cross had a materially correlative bearing, the one was the counterpart of the other, as the impression is a facsimile of the die. Hence from of old it was known that "without shedding of blood is no remission." [Heb. ix. 22. ATONEMENT. BLOOD. EUCHARIST.] The essential part of the sacrifice was the blood dashed against the altar at its two opposite angles, that each side might receive the symbol of the Atonement. The blood also declared the vicarious character of the victim's suffering and death, foreshadowing the sufferings of Christ. And thus it was from the beginning of the world. Abel sacrificed the firstlings of the flock, while Cain offered of the fruits of the earth; and the sacrifice of blood was accepted as the "more excellent" [Heb. xi. 4]; for the fruits of the earth could never represent a vicarious sacrifice [see Delitzsch on Gen. iv. 4]. The difference of the two offerings is expressed, darkly indeed but with sufficient significance, in the words addressed to Cain, "If thou doest well shalt thou not be accepted; and if thou doest not well (and needest an atonement), sin [i.e. a "sin-offering," חטאת, Lev. vi. 18-23] lieth [רבץ, "crouches as a fourfooted beast," the only meaning of the verb] at thy door;" i.e. the sacrifice of blood is always within thy reach, the substitution of a typical life and a vicarious suffering for the sin of the soul. After the Flood, Noah offered a sacrifice of "every clean beast and every clean fowl" [Gen. viii. 20], types of the sinless, and made atonement for the germ of humanity, and for earth its dwelling-place. The vicarious sacrifice was accepted, "and the Lord said in His heart, I will not again curse the ground for man's sake." At a later period, when Abraham was justified by faith [Gen. xv. 6], his more immediate reward was a promise of the Land of Canaan, from the Nile to the Euphrates [ver. 18], but that land was only a type of an eternal and heavenly rest; and God Himself prescribed the sacrifice that should ratify the covenant of justification by faith, and confirm the promise to his spiritual seed of their true home, eternal in the heavens. It was a compendium of every vicarious sacrifice under the Law, for it consisted of one of each of the piacular victims so used; "Take me an heifer of three years old, and a she-goat of three years old, and a ram of three years old, and a turtle-dove and a young pigeon; and he took unto him all these, and divided them in the midst, and laid each piece one against the other, but the birds divided he not" [ver. 9, 10]. At nightfall the solemn ratification of the covenant took place, the Divine Shechinah passing between the halved victims; as afterwards the whole people of Israel, princes as well as commonalty, renewed covenant with God by passing between the severed portions of their sacrifice [Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19]. As the sacrifice of Noah through faith in the future Saviour indicated the redemption of the creature, i.e. the earth of God's creation, from the bondage of corruption, so the sacrifice of Abraham declared the salvation of millions in those who should inherit his faith; and the victims that he offered once more foreshadowed the sufferings whereby that salvation should be worked out. Fear of offending Egyptian prejudices [Exod. viii. 26] interfered with the national sacrifice during the residence of the Israelites in Egypt; but the institution of the Passover revived it, and brought the notion of sacrifice into still closer proximity to the antitypal sacrifice of Christ. It was a federal vicarious rite in its first institution, to which a commemorative character was afterwards added. For "the life (Nephesh) of the flesh is in the blood" [Lev. xvii. 11]; and the life of the victim displayed upon the door posts was a sure safeguard for the life of the inmates. Where there was no blood no vicarious offering of life for life had been given, and death was in that house.

Under the Law the vicarious import of sacrifice is clearly marked. Thus on the great day of Atonement the two goats constituted together one sin-offering [Lev. xvi. 5, 10]. The blood of one, the Lord's lot [ver. 8, 9], was carried into the Holy of Holies by the high priest, and sprinkled upon and before the mercy seat; and the sins of the people were laid upon the head of the other victim, the Azazel [ver. 8, 10, 26] or scape-goat, which was led into the wilderness, and there let loose; contact with it was contaminating, and he who conducted it to the wilderness was compelled to purify himself and his garments with water, before he could be readmitted into the camp [ver. 26]. Confession of the sins of the people, and imposition of hands by the sacrificing priest, elsewhere separately mentioned, but here connected in one act, marked the vicarious character of the rite. It was a maxim of the Jewish doctors that without confession of sin there was never any imposition of hands [Outram, De Sacr. i. xv. 8; Lev. iii. iv. v. 5, xvi. 21; Numb. v. 7]; though the precise formula given is of comparatively recent date. This imposition of hands was made with the most complete religious intention of spirit [Magee On the Atonement, xxxix.], and with the full weight of the body [סמך ידו], "with all his might" [בכל כח], as Maimonides explains it; to denote the full judicial weight of sin borne by the victim or guilty object [compare Lev. xxiv. 14, 15]. In ordinary sacrifices it was an act of personal duty; none might confess or lay hands upon the victim but he whose transgression needed to be atoned. It was thus that on the great day of Atonement the two goats represented one integral sacrifice, and foreshadowed the evangelical reality of the sacrifice of the Cross whereby Christ bore our iniquities and was made a curse for us.

Midway between the types and shadows of the Law and the Christian verity stands the prophetic forecast of the person and office of Christ. The rays of light were pencilled on the page of prophecy, but they were only gathered into their true focus in the person of Christ. Thus the voice of prophecy speaks clearly of the vicarious nature of Christ's sufferings. The fifty-third chapter of Isaiah is conclusive with regard to this point; shewing that the Messiah should be a sacrifice for sin; that by His stripes we are healed; that the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all; and that He should be cut off from the land of the living, even as Daniel declared that he should "be cut off, but not for Himself." [Dan. ix. 26. Outram, de Sacrificiis. Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. Hirschfeld, Gesch. d. V. Isr. Maurice, Doctrine of Sacrifice.]

VICE. Vice is chronic and habitual transgression of the moral law, as distinguished from those transgressions which result from momentary temptation. As the "tree in which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed," so sin has "its seed in itself," which by habit of growth becomes inveterate vice. Vice being a phase of SIN, whatever has been said under that head is applicable here, where it is proposed to consider briefly [1] the character of vice; [2] its hatefulness to God and man; [3] its greater hopelessness than mere sin.

I. Vice, like every other habit, whether good or bad, is the product of repeated acts; the passive impressions that accompany such acts, as in all other cases, decrease in inverse ratio with the increase of strength in the habit, to whose growth those acts have ministered. In other words, as the vicious habit strengthens, the mind of its victim becomes less and less conscious of the evil of which it is the slave, and sin is at length committed almost without knowing it, certainly without any compunctious stings of conscience; though these, so long as sufficient grace be left to feel them, are no insignificant evidence of the penal consequences of vice [Butler's Anal. I. iii. 4, v.]. Vice determines the whole character of its victim; it is to the soul what habitual imprudence is in the affairs of life, causing complications that quickly become hopeless. One wrong act after another effectually darkens the light within; the man of hardened vice knows not where he is or the direction he is taking: he is in a labyrinth, and if a faint glimmering of light shines in upon the soul for a moment he has no sure clue to follow, for his own intoxicated reason is no guide, save where it speaks to him, in some moment of steadier thought, of wrath treasured up against the day of wrath. The lightning shines for a moment in the pitchy darkness, as the Korân says, and the wayfarer beholds every feature of the country; but it vanishes again, while the thunders of the Almighty ring fearfully in his ears.

II. The hatefulness of vice both to God and man is shewn in the whole of God's moral government of the world. As He is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, so He has ordained that this fact should be impressed upon His disciplinal government of man as a social being. Thus, even in this world, vice is foredoomed by the unmistakeable judgment of God, and the human agents of the sentence, even though they be themselves under similar condemnation, allow the law to be holy and just and good. And this law of the Divine government would have in itself sufficient operative energy to carry out its principle to its full length, but that human blindness is the executant of its behests; "probitas laudatur et alget," but it is only because its worth is not fully known, and vice is prosperous, only because the varnish of hypocrisy is sufficiently thick and smooth to elude detection. The law itself, however, is so certain and invariable, that the future punishment of sin and wickedness that is inevitable, may be believed to differ in degree rather than in kind from our own social discouragements of vice. Thus exalted virtue secures the admiration of even the worthless, and vice, when punished, is as universally acknowledged by both good and bad, as a matter of satisfaction, to have met with its deserts. That virtue should be rewarded and vice punished is as natural a sequence in the moral order of things as that health should bring happiness, and disease discomfort in man's physical nature. A society for the suppression of vice meets with universal approval, but what reckless crew, with "pecca fortiter" as its motto, however steeped in infamy, could succeed in organizing one for the discouragement of virtue? Human nature runs counter to the bare thought of such a monstrous notion, because the interests of Society, wholly consonant with the Divine Law, demand that virtue should be sought out and encouraged, and vice checked with severity, as the root of all mischief, as a contamination to others, and as a sure element of confusion and disorder to the society on which it is a blot. "The Author of Nature has as truly directed that vicious actions, considered as mischievous to society, should be punished, and put mankind under a necessity of thus punishing them, as He has directed and necessitated us to preserve our lives by food" [Butler's Anal. I. iii. 3, and compare 4].

III. Then there is the greater hopelessness of vice that more clearly than anything else bespeaks the wrath of God. It is an enduring plague; everything tends to shew this. The evil consequences of youthful folly may be lightly thought of at the time, but they remain as a root of bitterness to mar the peacefulness of more mature years; "what profit had ye in those things whereof ye are now ashamed," when Satan's dazzling spells have proved to be a mockery and a delusion, and the remembrance of them poignant with self-reproach? "Wrong behaviour in youth increases in several ways the difficulties of right behaviour in mature age; that is, puts us into a more disadvantageous state of trial in our temporal capacity" [Butler, I. iv.]. Nay more, an imprudent choice of vicious companions, for their talent or sparkling wit, will often meet with the same severe retribution as a course of downright vicious action. Can a man touch pitch and not be defiled? The most neutral incident in a young life under such circumstances receives a wrong colouring from the reflexion of darker tints that stand around it, and "noscitur a sociis" means a retribution that is as natural in the case of indiscretion as it is in that of positive vice.[1] So determinately has it been decreed that vice, and everything that directly or indirectly belongs to it, should not go unpunished; and so hopeless is its escape from condemnation so far as its own nature is concerned.

[1] See Butler's Analogy, I. ii. on Divine punishments, and I. iii. 2. "From such a constitution of things it cannot but follow that prudence and imprudence which are of the nature of virtue and vice, must be, as they are, respectively rewarded and punished."

Possibly it was as seeing the comparative hopelessness of a relapse into a course of heathen vice that St. Paul is so urgent in laying down to the Hebrews [Heb. ii. 1-3, iii. 7-19, iv. 1-13, vi. 4-9, x. 26-31, 38, 39, xii. 15-17, 25-29] the unpardonable character of apostasy; "corruptio optimi pessima;" whereby Satan would obtain entrance again into the chamber "swept and garnished," and bringing seven spirits more wicked than himself, fill it with a sevenfold maliciousness, according to the terrible description given elsewhere by the same Apostle, "Being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant-breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful: who, knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them" [Rom. i. 29-32]. In such utter loss of baptismal purity every stay is abandoned, and a loose rein is given to the full and hopeless dominion of besetting sins that as "legion" crave for their indulgence. Substitute now the case of those who have grown up in a Christian land, and have always enjoyed the offer of the Gospel in the fullest run of its privileges, in lieu of those renegade adult converts of whom the Apostle was speaking, and the case will be found to be rather strengthened by the change; for even "to whom men have committed much, of them will they demand the more." When the last struggle of conscience is over in the lapsed Christian, the whole inward man is depraved. The whole spirit is steeped and overwhelmed in moral wretchedness. The whole heart is sick, and the whole head faint. Not even in the faintest whisper does conscience make itself heard; "The good that I would I do not, and the evil that I would not that I do. Oh wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death!" Where this is the condition of the vicious heart need we be surprised to be told by an Apostle that "it is impossible" [ἀδύνατον, difficile; Schleusner] "for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put Him to an open shame" [Heb. vi. 4-6].

VIGILS. Anciently the prayers used at night, the watching and preparation before a festival: in modern use the fasted eve of a festival. During the early times of persecution, when even the place of worship was concealed, the Christians were forced to meet during the night for worship. And so the practice, at first unavoidable, became systematized, and continued after persecution ceased. But it is not unlikely, independently of the necessity of avoiding publicity, that as the Jewish Sabbath commenced at sunset of the sixth day, so in adapting the Jewish to the Christian service, a similar anticipatory ceremonial would be retained for the Lord's day. At Easter, in particular, the occasion demanded a more careful and extensive preparation, and the night before the feast was devoted to a solemn service. From this the more important festivals were by degrees distinguished in the same way, and little by little the custom became general. There were three stated hours of prayer in the night. To the faithful there was an additional reason for nightly watches in the belief that our Lord was to come to judgment in the night.[1] The passage that suggested this belief was the parable of the ten virgins [Matt. xxv. 6]. St. Isidore [A.D. 636] speaking of the time when the angel of the Lord smote the Egyptians, says,[2] "Iisdem etiam horis venturum sese in Evangelio Salvator astruxit." Pliny names the meeting by night, but this was the ordinary meeting for worship, not a vigil in the later sense. The scriptural authority collected by St. Jerome [A.D. c. 390], who had occasion to defend the custom against Vigilantius, is abundant.[3] As the immediate occasion of the nocturnal assemblies passed away, the character of the services was changed. Vigils were held sometimes in private houses. In the fourth century abuses had begun to creep in, and by degrees became considerable. Occasionally the vigils held in the cemeteries at the tombs of the martyrs became scenes of revelry and debauchery. Under the pretence of devotion many excesses were committed. At Milan St. Ambrose revived the practice: he did not abolish vigils, but caused them to be properly superintended. Arbitrary and self-imposed vigils were those at which the abuses mostly occurred. Hence Perpetuus, Bishop of Tours [A.D. 482], issued an authorized table of vigils.[4] As early as A.D 420, some vigils had been discountenanced and even forbidden. But these prohibitions were ineffective, although frequently re-enacted in different countries.[5] The Gauls in especial appear to have encouraged the frequent use of vigils. Not

[1] Lactantius, ii. 19, gives a Sibylline verse referring to this:—

ὁππότ' ἀν ἔλθῃ
πῦρ ἔσται, σκότος ἐν τῇ μέσσῃ νυκτὶ μελαίνῃ.

[2] De Eccl. Off. xxii.

[3] Ep. 36, de Observatione Vigiliarum. Psa. vi. 6, cxix. 62, cxxxii. 4, cxxxiv. 1; Isa. xxvi. 9; Matt. xiii. 25 (Quod si non dormissent, nec malus fortasse zizania seminare potuisset); Luke ii. 37, vi. 12, xii. 35; Acts xvi. 25; 2 Cor. vi. 5, xi. 27; 1 Thess. v. 6; and many other passages.

[4] Bar. viii. 482 (ed. Migne). They were the vigils before the feasts of Christmas, Epiphany, Nativity of St. John Baptist, St. Peter, Sexto Kalendar Aprilis in Resurrectione, Easter, Ascension Day, Quinquagesima, Beheading of St. John Baptist, Saints Peter and Paul, St. Martin, St. Symphorian, St. Lidorius, and St. Hilary. This makes fourteen in all. In the Church of England there are sixteen festivals whose eves are appointed for fasting.

[5] As at Buda [A.D. 1279], where the canon ran thus:—"Præcipimus quod ecclesiarum rectores in suis ecclesiis vigilias fieri a laicis non permittant, cum ex hoc scandala proveniant et peccata, nisi forsan in illis ecclesiis, in only those in private houses, but even those in churches, began to be accompanied with dancing, pagan rites, and unbecoming games. This was particularly the case with the vigils kept in honour of St. Martin, which were denounced by name as superstitious, together with wakes, "vigiliæ circa corpora mortuorum," in A.D. 590. St. Isidore[1] blames those who objected to the principle of keeping vigil, and calls them "a kind of heretics." They were named Nyctages, or Nystazontes. St. Bernard (twelfth century) has a sermon on the vigil of Saints Peter and Paul, shewing the uses to which vigils may be applied. The solemn dedication of the nights before Christmas and Easter to devotional exercise has found favour with all Christians. In the Church of England there is a growing disposition to adopt a solemn late service at midnight, or near it, before these feasts.

VIRGINITY. The unmarried or celibate state, voluntarily accepted as a means of holiness. When Christian communities were formed, the subject of celibacy or virginity, and its place in the divine economy, soon became a matter of inquiry, as we learn from St. Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians: the subject being specially brought forward in the seventh chapter. The general import of the Apostle's teaching, or his express or implied assertions, seem to shew that the celibate state is superior to that of marriage: "he would have all men as himself" unmarried; the virgin is "holy both in body and in spirit;" "he that giveth the virgin in marriage doeth well; he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better." It has sometimes been asserted that the Apostle's commendation of virginity was merely on account of temporary reasons, as in ver. 26, "I suppose that this is good (i.e. the unmarried state) on account of the present distress." St. Paul, it is argued, might refer by these words to persecutions which Christians were then exposed to. Yet this does not fully and adequately express his meaning: and it can hardly be said with the chapter in question before us that this is even the primary reason why the Apostle gives a preference to celibacy. As Estius[2] shews, the Apostle's words, compared with other passages in this chapter, cannot be supposed to have this limited or exclusive reference; nor would his teaching then, as is obviously intended, be of general application, or have any bearing upon the ordinary condition of Christians in after ages.

The import of the Apostle's language in this chapter seems so clear and unequivocal to Olshausen[3] that he thus remarks on verses 32-34: "These words are so strong as to incline to the belief that the Apostle gives an objective preference to celibacy, as the (Roman) Catholic Church maintains." He adds that the Apostle's "words are so strongly expressed that the defenders of celibacy are obliged to limit them," and that if the saying "she that is married careth for the things of the world how she may please her husband," "is intended to refer to marriage, it would directly destroy the idea of a life devoted to God." This passage, he says, can only be understood to mean that "the Apostle is describing the ordinary state of things, from the influence of which the believer is frequently not exempt, but that by no means a description of marriage, or of Christian marriage, is here given." Now, admitting that the Apostle is describing what marriage ordinarily is, it is certain that he is referring to Christian marriage, as the subject is directly before him: to suppose any reference to heathen marriage in his advice for the guidance of Christian society would be manifestly unallowable. But the commentator rightly says that Christian marriage does not necessarily imply a state of bondage to earthly cares and trials, though the Apostle undoubtedly teaches or implies that such is its manifest tendency in whatever degree realized, or even if not at all: just as in the corresponding clause of the sentence, the virgin's freedom from the duties of marriage leaves the fullest time and opportunity (whether or not they are duly improved) for her devotion to the Lord's service. Admitting this, the inference is unquestionable, that as regards Christian duties and obligations virginity is a higher or preferable state to that of marriage. St. John also intimates the same truth in the Apocalypse, when he says of the hundred and forty and four thousand before the Throne, who alone can sing the new song of the Redeemed and follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth, that they are not defiled with women, for they are virgins [xiv. 3, 4].

But the Scripture not only teaches the especial excellence of virginity, it also presents an example of its realization in Christian life. In St. Paul's last journey to Jerusalem, St. Luke speaks of his meeting the four daughters of St. Philip the Evangelist, who were virgins, or had made a profession of virginity. Had they been merely unmarried women, to record the fact would have been superfluous and unmeaning. They have been always, as à Lapide says, recorded in the catalogue of virgins. The pre-eminence of the virgin state is unanimously taught by the Fathers from the Apostolic age. Thus St. Ignatius, in his epistle to Polycarp, "If any one quibus ex devotione fidelium tales consuevcrunt fieri ab antiquo" [Raynaldus, in continuation of Baronius, xlii. Concilium Budense]. They were forbidden also at York in A.D. 1367.

[1] "Est autem quoddam genus hæreticorum, superfluas existimantium sacras vigilias, et spirituali opere infructuosus, dicentes jussa temerari divina, qui noctem fecit ad requiem, sicut diem ad laborem" [De Eccl. Off. xxii.]

[2] "Instantem seu præsentem necessitatem non nulli interpretantur necessitatem moriendi. Quod non placet. Alii ingruentes persecutiones quas facilius ferunt et expeditius fugiunt qui conjugem et liberos non habent, secundum illud Salvatoris Væ prægnantibus et nutrientibus in illis diebus [Matt. xxiv.] Verum quia generalis est Apostoli doctrina pertinens etiam ad tempora ecclesiæ pacata: magis probo generalem commentarium quem huc adferunt plerique tam Græci quam Latini, per instantem necessitatem intelligentes hujus sæculi molestias et incommoda quæ plurimum secum trahit status conjugalis: quas paulo post, alio nomine, tribulationes carnis [v. 28] Apostolus appellat." [Comment. in loco.] can remain in chastity for the honour of the Lord's flesh, let him remain without boasting." And in his epistle to the Smyrnæans, he salutes the virgins. In the Apostolical Constitutions [iv. 14] we find the vow or profession of virginity clearly recognised. "Concerning virginity, we have received no commandment, but we leave it in the power of those that are willing as a vow [εὐχήν], exhorting them so far in this matter that they do not promise anything rashly, since Solomon says, 'It is better not to vow, than to vow and not pay.' Let [such] a virgin therefore be holy in body and soul, as the temple of God, as the house of Christ, as the habitation of the Holy Spirit. For she that vows [ἐπαγγειλαμένην] ought to do such things as are suitable to her vow [ἐπαγγέλμα], and to shew that her vow is real, and made on account of leisure for piety, and not to cast a reproach upon marriage." And Justin Martyr says that there are many men and women of sixty or seventy years of age who were made Christ's disciples from their youth, and remain in a state of virginity [ἄφθοροι διάμενουσι, Apol. i. 15]. Now, as the Apology from which this is quoted was addressed by St. Justin to the Emperor Antoninus about A.D. 148, these celibates, who were then of the age of sixty or seventy years, and whom, he says, he can produce from every nation, must have made their vow or profession during the lifetime of some of the Apostles, and, as can only be supposed, with their sanction. At the close of the second century we find a special reason assigned for the honour paid to virgins: though this was probably always understood or implied in the vow of virginity. Tertullian speaks of virgins as "espoused to Christ [De Resurr. Carn. lxi.], married to God, and preserving their beauty for Him" [Ad Uxor. i.]. St. Cyprian also says of one who had quitted her state as a virgin, that she was false, if not to a husband, yet to Christ, and describes in glowing terms the exalted rank of virginity in the Church, and of the special rewards promised to them in the heavenly kingdom [De Habit. Virg.].

[3] Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians, in loco, Clark's transl.

We shall now sum up what is known, or may probably be conjectured, respecting virginity during the first three centuries. It was from the first a life-long profession. Virgins did not then live in community, but with parents or relatives. This is an acknowledged fact, which may be illustrated from certain irregularities which St. Cyprian censures amongst virgins, which could hardly have existed in community life, some of them frequenting the same bath with men, or, on account of their wealth, being adorned with rich clothing and ornaments. Probably their vow was at first secretly made, being only known to parents or relatives; though the virgin in some cases adopted a peculiar dress which would exhibit her profession to the world. Such a dress was probably not the general usage, and its adoption or not doubtless depended much on individual taste or judgment. Even wearing a veil, then the ordinary usage of females, was not universal amongst professed virgins at the close of the second century. Tertullian, in his treatise De Velandis Virginibus, strongly recommends the custom as most becoming "the spouses of Christ," but his language by no means implies that such was then the ordinary usage.

The profession of virginity did not at first depend on or require ecclesiastical sanction. It may rather be called a lay-movement in the Church, which originated from the teaching of our Lord and His Apostles. They had promised that to the celibate should be given the highest rewards of future happiness and glory; numbers of both sexes, and of every age and condition of life, believed the promise, and deprived themselves of the nearest and dearest earthly joys for the kingdom of Heaven's sake.

There was not for the first two centuries, so far as is known, any organization amongst celibates of either sex, regulating the times of prayer, fasting, and other religious exercises. But soon afterwards, as might have been expected, we find a further development of the celibate profession; the Church giving a direct sanction to the vow of virginity, which was publicly made with certain rites and ceremonies, and punishing most severely those who were faithless to their vow. Thus it is enjoined by the 13th canon of the Council of Eliberis [A.D. 305], that if virgins consecrated to God (Deo sacratæ) commit adultery (adulteraverint) by violating their vow, they are to be excommunicated, and not even allowed to receive the Eucharist when dying, unless by a life of subsequent penitence proof has been given that their fall was owing to sudden temptation or infirmity. St. Ambrose, in the fourth century, says that a veil was given to the virgin on making her profession, and that it was made publicly, and as his words imply, with a certain liturgical service in Church [De lapsu Virginis Consecratæ, c. v.].

But a still more important development of the celibate life took place in the third century. Celibates, as we have seen, first lived with parents or relatives, or sometimes alone in caves and deserts, removed from the temptations of the world; but this mode of life, though suitable for some, was not found generally beneficial: life in community, in many respects, was obviously preferable, where there was not only retirement from the world, but a mutual association in prayer and works of charity, and an encouragement of each other to faith, good works, and perseverance in their profession. St. Antony [A.D. 251-356] is generally considered the founder of the monastic system in the Church, but there can be no doubt that when he renounced the world, and even at an earlier date, community-life, in some degree, existed among celibates in Egypt. Sozomen mentions that Pachomius first lived alone in a cave, but that an angel appeared to him commanding him to assemble some monks to instruct them; and he makes mention of their rules of prayer, fasting, and manual labour [Soz. Hist. Eccl. iii. 14]. The first founder of religious communities of women is not certainly known; the initial stage would probably be that virgins in the same neighbourhood would agree to live together for mutual sympathy and help, and would gradually form a rule of life of prayer, fasting, and good works. St. Athanasius, in his life of St. Antony, informs us, (which seems to imply that conventual life was already established amongst women,) that on renouncing the world he committed his sister to the care of a community of virgins, or, as some assert, made her their superior. [MONASTICISM.]

VIRTUES, THEOLOGICAL. All virtue is the imitation of God, and the perfection of any leads to union with Him: in all virtue also there is a human element founded on a recognition of creaturely inferiority. Thus courage in its highest aspect is an imitation of the Divine protest against wrong, "The Lord is a man of war;" but as wrong can be formidable to a limited and imperfect being, human courage includes contempt of danger. Often we measure courage by the degree of danger contemned, and this is reasonable if we test the strength of devotion to a good cause by the strength of danger which it conquers. Again, humility in one aspect is a recognition of the ever-present contrast between the littleness and imperfection of the creature and the perfect majesty of God; in another, perhaps a higher, it is an imitation of the all-embracing love of Him "Who humbleth Himself to behold the things that are in heaven and earth." It follows that the theological virtues are not distinguished from the moral or cardinal virtues, in the sense that the theological virtues are concerned with our duty to God and the moral virtues with our duty to man. The real distinction is, that the theological virtues presuppose a knowledge of the revealed nature of God as a condition of their exercise, while the moral virtues issue in such a knowledge, as it is written, "if any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine."

The theological virtues are Faith, Hope, Love, otherwise called Charity: of which two are preliminaries and conditions of the third, which includes them and will supersede them. There can be no doubt that the enumeration was determined originally by the well-known passage in the first epistle to the Corinthians, and the division is sufficiently incidental to raise the question upon what systematic principle it originally rested, or if indeed it rested upon any. The three are practically inseparable, and it might be said with almost equal plausibility that each of them generates the others. The common order has been well given by Keble:—

> "Faith is their fixed unswerving root,
> Hope their unfading flower,
> Fair deeds of charity their fruit,
> The glory of their bower."

This implies that the order is as follows, first we believe the revealed law of truth and duty, then we desire the reward of obedience and the blessing of the triumph of righteousness, then we practise the duties lovingly. Another way of representing it would be that, first we look forward to what is promised, and then both practise what is commanded and also believe the testimony; yet another, and one which perhaps is as often to be traced in experience as either of the others, is when the soul begins by doing that which God has commanded, and so attains to desire that which He has promised, and to believe His record of Himself. This uncertainty as to the order in which they arise in the individual does not affect their logical order, which is the same as that in which St. Paul enumerates them. Faith is the virtue of the understanding, Hope, according to St. John of the Cross, is the virtue of the memory, Charity of the will. In other words, the theological virtues are the right relation of the reason, the imagination, and the will, to the spiritual world as presented in revelation. As the spiritual world is real, it is our perfection to believe in it; as it is desirable and not yet made fully manifest, it is our perfection to hope for it; as the Supreme Good is revealed as the centre and foundation both of the spiritual world and of the natural, it is our perfection to love Him, both in Himself and in all His operations both of nature and of grace, to love Him and to love all things for His sake, to obey Him and to be fellow-workers with Him. It is obvious that Faith and Hope are constituted virtues by the gift of revelation; if the certainty of the truths which are their objects were natural, faith and hope would simply be forms of prudence. And for this reason among others they are partial and transitory, their place is under an economy where we have to be guided by a revelation which is not homogeneous with the rest of our knowledge, and will be superseded altogether with our present knowledge when we attain, if we attain, the central point from which we can discern the natural order and connection of truth. For the same reason also love is dependent upon the gift of revelation while we remain under the present dispensation. Because love is permanent and absolute, it follows that it can have no basis in the partial and transitory knowledge which is all that is attainable here. Revelation says, "Love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength." Reason says, "Be not righteous overmuch," and again, "All things come alike to all . . . to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not." Revelation says, "Love your enemies." Reason says, "Remember that they may become your friends, and that your friends may become your enemies," and even if we suppose that reason is capable of rising precariously to a transcendental point of view, this high theory remains as an ideal to gild some actions instead of being a rule for all, and the greater part of life has still to be regulated upon the low ground of practical experience. It is clear, therefore, that God in Revelation is the ground of Faith, Hope, and Charity, which are therefore properly called theological virtues. They are inseparable, "Faith without works is dead, being alone;" as it consists in a realization of the unseen, it tends directly to disappear when what we are to realise loses hold upon our desires and our actions. Hope clearly presupposes Faith, and its life is still more visibly dependent upon charity. Charity, of course, implies faith, and, though absolutely disinterested, is still accompanied more or less consciously by Hope, because, as we love the supreme good, so we must desire its complete manifestation, and there is nothing selfish in the desire, though our own blessedness is included in the regeneration of all things. In the Lord's Prayer all three are united, "Hallowed be Thy name" is the prayer of Faith, "Thy kingdom come" of Hope, "Thy will be done" of Love.

VOCATION. A calling, or "inward motion by the Holy Ghost" [Jer. xxiii. 21; Heb. v. 4; Rom. x. 15] to the ecclesiastical state, is marked by right motives in seeking it,—that is, without desire of the glory of this world, or of income, or a pleasant, easy life, but by readiness in enduring pain and labour, and by desire to promote the glory of God, and the edifying and salvation of man. Bishop Andrewes explains to Peter du Moulin, that the words "pastor" and "vocation," in the sense placed upon them by Protestants, that is, with the meaning of ordination and ministers, were innovations of the sixteenth century; as the pastorate of Scripture [1 Pet. ii 25] and of ecclesiastical writers designates the office of bishops, and "vocation" has its special meaning. The Thirty-third Article is distinct upon this point: "It is not lawful for any man to take upon him the office of public preaching, or ministering the sacraments in the congregation ["Ecclesia" Lat. Vers.] before he be lawfully called and sent to execute the same. And those we ought to judge lawfully called and sent which be chosen and called to this work by men who have public authority given unto them in the congregation to call and send ministers into the Lord's vineyard." "Our Apostles," says St. Clement, "knew, through our Lord Jesus Christ, that there should arise contention touching the name of the Episcopate, and for this cause, being endowed with a perfect prescience, they constituted the aforesaid (bishops and deacons) and thenceforward set down a succession, that when they were fallen asleep, then other men approved (of the Holy Spirit) might receive their office and ministry" [ad Corinth. c. xliv.]. The Thirty-sixth Article further and explicitly asserts that, "we decree all such to be rightly, orderly [ordine = κατὰ τάξιν], and lawfully consecrated and ordered," who have been "consecrated or ordered according to the rites" of the Ordinal; and in the preface to the latter it is said, "no man might presume to execute any of them" (the orders of bishops, priests and deacons) "except he were first called, tried, and examined, and known to have such qualities as are requisite for the same, and also by public prayer, with imposition of hands, were approved, and admitted thereunto by lawful authority," that is, "hath episcopal consecration or ordination." The candidate is therefore required to state that he "thinks he is truly called, according to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the due order of this realm (Ordering of Deacons, "this United Church of England and Ireland;" Ordering of Priests, and Consecration of Bishops), to the ministry of the Church."

VULGATE. [Versions.]

W

WAFER. The name technically given to the bread used for Holy Communion in Roman Churches, and allowed, though not commanded, by the Book of Common Prayer.

It is not proposed in this article to enter into the question of the use or non-use of leaven, but simply to state the history of the adoption of the wafer form. Yet it is difficult to determine with anything like certainty when the use of wafers began. At first, no doubt, the offerings of the people were consecrated, but it is easy to see how, as Christians became more numerous, this custom would be in many ways inconvenient and even objectionable. Moreover, feelings of reverence would teach that the bread used for so holy a purpose should be the very purest and best possible, and not that which was common, coarse, and liable to much impurity. It was partly on this account that the use of leaven gradually ceased in the West. It is certain, moreover, that the bread given at the Holy Communion had a special and marked appearance. Bede [Eccl. Hist. ii. c. 5] relates how the sons of King Sabert [A.D. 616] asked the Bishop Mellitus, "Why do you not give us also that white bread (panem nitidum) which you used to give to our father, and which you still continue to give to the people in the church?" Mabillon [Analecta, p. 151] quotes a Spanish writer, Eldefonso or Hildefonsus, who wrote A.D. 845. "Non debent," he says, "in hostiis scribi nisi unum ex his tribus quale vis, aut $\overline{\text{XPC}}$, aut $\overline{\text{IHC}}$, aut $\widehat{\text{DS}}$, nisi tantum in una parte $\widehat{\text{XPC}}$, et in alia crux cum duabus literis ita $\overset{+}{\widehat{\text{XPC}}}$ Aω. In uno nempe ferro, tamen magno, possunt quinque simul hostiæ formari." Martene mentions a pair of irons for baking these breads of very ancient date, as existing at Braine.

By the twelfth century it is clear that wafers had become general in the West. Gillebert, Bishop of Limerick [A.D. 1090], mentions irons for baking them [Vet. Epist. Hibern. Syll., ed. Usserio, p. 59]. Honorius of Autun [circa 1120] says, "Statutum esse panem consecrandum in modum denarii formari vel fieri" [De Gemma Animæ, 66]. And the reason of this he gives in chap. xxxv., "ideo imago Domini cum litteris in hoc pane exprimitur quia et in denario imago et nomen imperatoris scribitur." Durandus mentions the same custom [De Ritibus, ii. c. 38, n. 6], and quotes from St. Epiphanius the word στρογγυλοειδὴς, "somewhat round," as applied to the altar-bread. Martene quotes Honorius as above, and also a very old manuscript he found at Molême, containing a couplet which would appear to have been commonly known:—

> "Candida, triticea, tenuis, non magna, rotunda, > Expers fermenti non salsa sit hostia Christi."
> [De Ant. Eccl. Rit. bk. i. c. 3, sec. 7.]

This couplet is also mentioned by a synod held in the Isle of Man in the fourteenth century. It seems clear that at the time Honorius wrote wafers were generally adopted.

Wafers were usually made by those in holy orders, or in their presence. Martene quotes "Theodulfus Aurelianensis Episcopus" as directing "Panes quos Deo in sacrificium offertis aut a vobis ipsis, aut a vestris pueris coram vobis nitide et studiose fiant" [De Ant. Eccl. Rit. ut supra]. An Anglo-Saxon decree [Eccl. Instit. &c., ed. Thorpe, vol. ii. p. 404] says, "We also command that the ofletes[1] which in the Holy Mystery ye offer to God, ye either bake yourselves or your servants before you."

The Prayer Book of 1549 directed that the bread should be "unleavened and round, as it was afore, but without all manner of print, and something more larger and thicker than it was, so that it may be aptly divided in divers pieces." Our present rubric, "It shall suffice," &c., was inserted in 1552. Bishop Cosin proposed a rubric containing the words "though wafer-bread (pure and without any figure set upon it) shall not be forbidden, especially in such churches where it hath been accustomed." It is plain that a rubric which pronounces the "bread such as is usual to be eaten" to be sufficient does not thereby prohibit wafers, but suggests rather the contrary, i.e. the ordinary use of wafers, and the permitted use of common bread. Historical evidence also confirms this interpretation. Archbishop Parker, writing to Parkhurst, Bishop of Norwich, refers to the rubric, and says, "I trust that you mean not universally in your diocese to command or wink at the loaf-bread, but, for peace and quietness, here and there to be contented therewith" [Corresp. p. 460]. In his visitation articles he inquires "Whether they do use to minister the Holy Communion in wafer-bread, according to the Queen's Majesty's Injunctions?" Bishop Andrewes always used wafers, and doubtless the troubled and rebellious character of the times, and the influence of the foreign reformers alone prevented it from being the regular custom.

[1] The common name for altar-bread—also "obley."

The Oriental churches are very careful in the preparation of altar bread. In Greece it is made in the form of a round loaf, and stamped with the seal $\frac{\text{IC} \mid \text{XC}}{\text{NI} \mid \text{KA}}$ i.e. Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς νίκα, "Jesus Christ conquers." [Bona, Rerum Liturg. lib. vi. Mabillon, De Pane Azymo. Martene, De Antiq. Eccl. Rit. i. c. 3.]

WALDENSES. A sect founded in the South of France about the middle of the twelfth century, originally known by the name of "The Poor of Lyons," but afterwards called by the name of their founder Peter Waldo.[1]

Much has been written about the antiquity of the Waldenses, who were at one time supposed to have a direct line of association with the Primitive Church. But the popular ideas as to their antiquity have arisen from the fact that some of Waldo's followers migrated from Lyons to the country between France and Italy, then still occupied by some of the ALBIGENSES, and that superficial historians have confused their origin with that of the latter, who, though not themselves a sect of primitive antiquity, were in some way derived from the PAULICIANS. The association of the Waldenses with the Albigenses was, however, only of a local and social character, and as sects they were entirely distinct in their respective origins. Persons of more learning have been misled by ancient documents, such as the "Noble Lesson," which were once supposed to belong to the eleventh century; but these are now proved to be either forgeries or authentic documents of a later date than was supposed [Todd's Books of the Vaudois; Maitland's Facts and Documents relating to Albigenses and Waldenses].

Peter Waldo, Waldus, or, as he was sometimes called "Waldensis"[2] (that is of Vcaux, or Waldum, his birthplace, near Lyons), was a rich merchant of Lyons, and is said to have engaged a young priest of literary tastes, named Stephen d'Evisa, to translate books for him which he was unable to read in the original languages in which they were written. Among such translations was a collection of patristic comments on the Gospels and some other portions of Holy Scripture. By much reading of these Waldo was influenced to seek a life of perfection according to the literal precepts of the Gospel, especially by "selling all that he had" to give to the poor. His new-born zeal, and the contagion with which ascetic mysticism always spreads among multitudes, soon made Waldo the leader of a large number of citizens, who assumed the name of the Poor of Lyons [A.D. 1160] from their avowed rule of poverty. Their religion becoming fanatical in its character they were rebuked by the Archbishop of Lyons, who forbad them to preach or to expound the Holy Scriptures. They answered, however, in holy words which every generation of fanatics presumptuously and profanely adopts, that Christ had commanded them to "preach the Gospel to every creature" [Mark xvi. 15], and that they "ought to obey God rather than men" [Acts v. 29]. Waldo and his followers claimed to hold a commission in the same manner as it was held by those to whom Christ had given it by word of mouth, and who received the inspiration of the Holy Ghost for their work, and thought it their duty to disobey the otherwise lawful commands of their ecclesiastical superior. This open resistance to authority brought about the condemnation of the Waldenses at the fourth Lateran Council [A.D. 1179], and led, eventually, to their excommunication by Lucius III. in A.D. 1183. Waldo himself died in the year 1192. Perhaps their resistance did a still more extensive though indirect mischief to the Church, by calling out this decree of excommunication than by their schism, for it laid the foundation and marked out the plan of the Inquisition [Maitland's Facts and Docum. p. 176]. When driven from Lyons they spread largely in Lombardy and Piedmont.

The Waldenses were, at first, merely a society of enthusiasts, who conformed to the Church of the mediæval period in everything except submission to authority; but whose freedom of action (rather than opinion) took the strong form of preaching when, where, and what, they liked, without ordination, and without commission or license. There were probably many lay-preachers among the monks and friars of the period, but they always acted in obedience to authority, and did not, therefore, offer a precedent to the new party. When that party was excommunicated, the necessities of the position they had assumed forced them (like the Methodists in England in a later age) to establish a ministry, and their departure from Catholic principles was the natural result. Their decadence went on gradually until the Reformation, when the Waldenses readily amalgamated with the followers of Calvin and the "Church of Geneva." Several of them had much to do with the spread of Socinianism at Geneva, to his great trouble, even in Calvin's lifetime. Since the Reformation there has been nothing to distinguish the Waldenses from other Calvinistic Protestants except their name; but, like the Huguenots of France, they suffered much persecution during the seventeenth century. At the present day their habits are less religious than those of most Protestants, but the Bible Society and other English mission institutions have used great efforts to reclaim them, and there is reason to hope these endeavours have not been altogether without success.

[1] The first trace of the name "Waldenses" is said to be in an edict of Ildephonsus, King of Arragon, which speaks of the "Waldenses, otherwise called the Poor of Lyons." The name sometimes had a mystical turn given to it, q. d. "Vallenses, in valle lachrymarum manentes." Hence the idea that the "Vallenses" were so called from the "valleys" of Piedmont.

[2] He is so called by Stephen de Belleville, a Dominican who wrote about the year 1225, some thirty years after the death of Waldo. "Waldenses autem dicti sunt a primo hujus hæresis auctore, qui nominatus fuit Waldensis. Dicuntur etiam Pauperes de Lugduno, quia ibi inceperunt in professione paupertatis. Vocant autem de Pauperes spiritu." But Maitland gives nine examples of persons named Waldo between the eighth and the eleventh centuries. [Facts and Docum. p. 108.]

WAVE-OFFERING. The wave-offering according to Talmudic tradition, consistently also with the terms of the Law [Exod. xxix. 24; Lev. viii. 27], was made by the priest placing the wave-offering on the hands of the person who offered it, with his own hands beneath, and moving it forwards and backwards [מוליך ומביא, Talm.], to signify that it was offered to God, and restored by Him to the use of man; later Jewish tradition adds that it was waved also from right to left and vice versa, but with what symbolism does not appear. The wave-offering was made on the consecration of priests [Lev. viii. 25], the completion of the Nazarite's vow [Numb. vi. 20], the jealousy offering [Numb. v. 25], the leper's offering [Lev. xiv. 12], the bread of the first-fruits, the two lambs as a peace-offering at Pentecost [Lev. xxiii. 20], and the wave-sheaf on the morrow morn of the Paschal Sabbath. This latter rite was highly typical. St. Paul recognises its complete significance. "Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first-fruits of them that slept" [1 Cor. xv. 20]; "Christ the first-fruits" [1 Cor. xv. 23. It would seem also that he was writing about the time of the Paschal feast; 1 Cor. v. 7, compare 1 Cor. xvi. 8]. In any case this provision of the Law shews that on the day following the Paschal Sabbath, throughout the whole of which our Lord lay in the sepulchre, this wave-offering of the first-fruits of the barley harvest would in due course have been made before the rent veil in the Temple. And on that same day Christ the first-fruits of them that slept came forth from the tomb. This wave-sheaf was so indispensable, doubtless as being intended to typify the Lord's resurrection, that when the harvest was not sufficiently forward at the new moon to give hope of a wave-sheaf of ripened corn, an entire month was intercalated, which month was simply VeAdar, the second Adar. [Harvey on the Creeds, 375.]

WEEKS, PROPHETIC. The only passage in prophecy where "weeks" are directly mentioned in a sense apparently different from the common one, but yet as a definite and intelligible measure of time, is Dan. ix. 24-27. It is, however, generally agreed that a large class of prophecies in both the Old and New Testaments are framed on the same principle as this one, and that it and they mutually illustrate one another. This principle is expressly enunciated in two passages,—Numb. xiv. 34, and conversely and more appositely, Ezek. iv. 6: in which places we are told that a day, in type, is to represent a year of history.

If this principle was recognised at all generally, and not only in the individual case of Ezekiel's symbolic action, nothing is more natural that these "prophetic days" should be grouped into "prophetic weeks," or periods of seven years. The septennial system of Hebrew chronology, and the repeated involution of the sabbatical period, must have made the grouping of years, like days, into weeks an obvious, if not a familiar, conception to the students of the Mosaic Law. There is indeed one passage [Gen. xxix. 27], and that a simple narrative one, where it is possible that a period of seven years is actually called a "week:" and though this is not the most probable explanation of the words, and a different one will actually contrast the "week" of days with the hebdomad of years, still it suggests a sense of a certain correlation between them. The seven years of service obtained the right to the week's wedding-feast.

Taking then the "weeks" of Daniel to be periods of seven years, it will be probable, to say the least, that the obscure prophecies, Dan. vii. 25, xii. 7, 11, 12; Rev. xi. 2, 3, 9, 11, xii. 6, 14, xiii. 5, are to be similarly understood. For, comparing these passages among themselves, it can hardly be doubted that they all refer to the same period—or, if more cautious language be preferred, that St. John referred to a period which he understood Daniel to have referred to, either directly or through a similar period typifying it. At any rate, it is almost certain that each writer is speaking of the same period in one passage as he himself does in the other; that the forty-two months of Rev. xi. 2, xiii. 5, are identical with the twelve hundred and sixty days of xi. 3, xii. 6; and again, that the "time, times, and a half," (i.e. three and a half years) of Dan. vii. 25 are the same as the similarly defined period of Dan. xii. 7, and that the twelve hundred and ninety, and thirteen hundred and thirty-five days, of Dan. xii. 11, 12, are an extension of these twelve hundred and sixty to a "month" or two longer. The "time, times, and a half," recurring in Rev. xii. 14, is so obvious a quotation from Daniel as to demonstrate a connection between the two groups of prophecy; but perhaps it is safer, in so obscure a matter, not to assume that the relation is that of absolute identity.

But whether the relation between them be more or less close, it cannot be accidental that they are capable of a common interpretation: and whatever may be their precise meaning, it is hardly doubtful that we have the right clue to it in the principle above named,—that a "day" in prophecy means a common year, and that these "days" are, for convenience of numeration or some other object, grouped together, not only into "weeks" of seven years, but into "months" of thirty years, and "times" of three hundred and sixty. Whatever the date from which the twelve hundred and sixty, twelve hundred and ninety, and thirteen hundred and thirty-five days are to be reckoned, whatever the nature of the events that are to follow at their respective terminations, a principle of interpretation which makes them thus mutually consistent is almost sure to be the true one. It seems indeed that in Daniel "a day" and "a week" are so definitely appropriated to this prophetical sense, that a periphrasis is required, to shew that the ordinary one is intended: thus we have the "three weeks of days" of x. 2, and "the two thousand three hundred evening-mornings" of viii. 14. To the latter is added the comment, "The vision of the evening and the morning . . . is true," is to be understood literally. One other possible instance may be added of the same manner of computation, viz. Luke xi. 30. Here "the sign of Jonas the prophet" seems connected not with his resurrection after three days, as in Matt. xii. 40, but with his message to Nineveh: which was "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be destroyed." It seems at least possible that this may be intended to refer to the forty years which elapsed (according to the probable chronology) from the Crucifixion to the destruction of Jerusalem.

Hardly any critic of eminence has disputed this system of calculation, as the one to be applied to the (really or fictitiously) prophetic chronology of Daniel. It is of course impossible to disprove the conjecture, that the weeks may be literal weeks. Daniel praying for a restoration of Judah, a year or two before the restoration was to come, may have been encouraged by being told, that it should come in the course of one year and one hundred and twenty-five days: and we are not well enough acquainted with either the history or the minute chronology of the period to say that nothing happened corresponding to what Daniel describes, even in the 25th and 26th verses. Zerubbabel or some one else may have reached Jerusalem seven weeks after the decree of Cyrus, the rebuilding have lasted a year and sixty-nine days, and some one (suppose Salathiel or Pedaiah, who may have returned with his son) have been assassinated at the end of that time. The malicious opposition [Ezra iv. 5] of the enemies of the Jews may have resulted, not only in this assassination, but in an interruption of the worship at the altar on the temple-site, three or four days after it. But this conjectural history is so absurdly arbitrary, that no reasonable person would accept it. Supposing the prophecy genuine, is it not certain that Ezra would have recorded its fulfilment? Supposing it a late forgery, what should have put it into the forger's head, either to invent these details, which to his contemporaries would be no sign of veracity, or to record them from some document which, if authentic, was almost certainly forgotten and unknown?

The sole authority worth mentioning for this opinion is, that apparently the Septuagint translator did regard the seventy weeks as reaching from the time of the vision to the rebuilding of Jerusalem—in which Daniel himself was to have a share. But by his wild guess-work in the remainder of the passage, this writer has destroyed his claim to regard: there can be no doubt that the seven weeks and sixty-two weeks are of the same kind as the seventy, whether they coincide with them or not. He (partly by a different reading of the unpointed text, partly by sheer guessing and mistranslation) substitutes "years" for "weeks," and adds the seventy, seven, and sixty-two together—commencing, however, not from the beginning nor the end of the first seventy weeks, but (if one is to credit him with any meaning at all, or with suggesting any rational interpretation of the prophecy) with a chronological era of some importance, but nowhere suggested in this passage. It is plain that he is not, like a Targumist, paraphrasing so as to suggest a traditional interpretation, but forcing the text so as to support a conjectural one. Such an act is not necessarily fraudulent: the translator saw that some passages of the book referred to the age of Antiochus, and not unnaturally believed that this did; and not being too profound a Hebrew scholar, or having a literary conscience too intolerant of barbarisms, he may have believed that the prophet meant what he has made him say, and said something suggesting it. But, whether the paraphrase is honest or fraudulent, the interpretation is impossible.

It appears, therefore, that the key to the interpretation of the passage in Daniel is to understand "a week" as seven years: and it is not difficult to find several theories, more or less plausible, giving periods of time when the prophecy was, on this interpretation, fulfilled. Perhaps the two most reasonable views are [1] that the end of the weeks is fixed by the "causing sacrifice and oblation to cease" in the middle of the last of them, i.e. that the period ends with the destruction of the Jewish polity and temple; [2] that the period of seventy weeks is that from B.C. 458 to A.D. 33, beginning with "the going forth of" Artaxerxes' first "commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem," and ending with our Lord's appearance, His sacrifice, and His rejection by the Jews. The former view seems to suit Daniel's description best; and it would embody the spirit of the other, for the destruction of Jerusalem was the direct consequence of the rejection of Christ, and "cutting off of Messiah." But it is much harder than the other to reconcile with any probable scheme of Persian chronology.

WHITSUN DAY. The English name for the great feast of Pentecost, i.e. the fiftieth day from Easter. The etymology of the term has been strangely confused. It has been derived [a] from White Sunday, in supposed allusion to the white garments of the Neophytes, as Whitsuntide was one of the two chief seasons for baptism; and [b] from Wytsonday, i.e. Wit, or Wisdom Sunday, in reference to the outpouring of Wisdom upon the Apostles. But the real White Sunday is the octave of Easter, or Dominica in albis, and both these derivations must be abandoned when the proper use of the title is considered. It is not Whit Sunday but Whitsun Day, as Easter is Easter Day, and the week is Whitsun Week, not Whit Week, and the season Whitsuntide, not Whittide. In Yorkshire, and doubtless also in other parts of England, the feast is commonly called Whissun Day, the accent being strongly thrown on the first syllable, and the two days following Whissun Monday and Whissun Tuesday. We have also mention in Burn's Ecclesiastical Law of Whitsun (not Whit) farthings or Pentecostals. The name is thus derived, as Dr. Neale shews [Essays on Liturgiology, &c.], directly from Pentecost, passing by various corruptions, Pingsten, Whingsten, into the German Pfingsten, and the English Whitsun. The Germans have also their Pfingsten Woche in exact correspondence to our Whitsun Week.

The great event which this festival celebrates is the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the Church, and its observance may be traced almost to the beginning of Christianity. It would naturally take the place in the Christian Church of the Jewish feast of Pentecost. St. Epiphanius interprets Acts xx. 16 of this festival [Hæres. lxxv.; Aerian. vi.]. St. Irenæus names it in connection with the custom of standing at prayers [Fragm. de Pasch. in Justin Mart.]. Tertullian alludes to it frequently [De Idol. xiv.; De Coron. Milit. iii.; De Bapt. xix., &c.]. Origen names it in his work against Celsus [c. viii.], and St. Gregory Nazianzen calls it ἡμέρα Πνεύματος [Orat. xliv., de Pentecost.]. The term Pentecost was applied not only to the day itself, but to the whole fifty days between it and Easter, which were one continued festival. During this time all fasting and kneeling at prayers were prohibited, the standing posture at prayers being enjoined by the twentieth Canon of the Council of Nicæa.

During Pentecost it was usual to read in the Church the Acts of the Apostles [see authorities cited by Bingham, Ant. XIV. iii. 3]. It was also one of the chief times for the administration of Holy Baptism, in memory no doubt of the baptism by fire and the baptism of the three thousand.

In the Greek Church this festival still retains its ancient name, and its octave is called the "festival of all martyrs" (κυριακὴ τῶν ἁγίων πάντων μαρτυρησάντων). This latter day is the Western Trinity Sunday.

It is interesting to notice that on Whitsun Day, A.D. 1549, the Book of Common Prayer in English was first used.

WIDOWS. The widows of the Church are first mentioned as a class in Acts vi. 1 and ix. 39. The fuller account of their organization and rules for their admission into the roll (κατάλογος) of the Church are found in 1 Tim. v. 3-13. In this passage St. Paul gives directions on the subject to St. Timothy as Bishop of Ephesus. He speaks of the widows as a recognised body, and of their enrolment (χήρα καταλεγέσθω, κ.τ.λ.). To their number were admitted only such as [1] were sixty years of age, [2] had been but once married (univira), and [3] were "well reported of for good works." The younger widows were to be refused, for fear lest they should renounce their profession by a second marriage, and thus "cast off their first faith" (τὴν πρώτην πίστιν ἠθέτησαν) which was pledged, by that profession of widowhood, to our Lord. Such are spoken of by the Apostle as ἔχουσαι κρῖμα, "having condemnation," or as it is remarked by Tertullian, "Habentes judicium quod primam fidem rescinderunt: illam videlicet à quâ in viduitate inventæ, et professæ eam, non perseverant" [De Monog. 13].

After this plain authority of the New Testament it is not surprising to find the office and service of the widows frequently mentioned by early writers. St. Ignatius, writing to the Church of Smyrna, salutes τὰς παρθένους τὰς λεγομένας χήρας, or as it is in the longer form of the Epistle τὰς ἀεὶ παρθένους καὶ τὰς χήρας. The Apostolic Constitutions speak of the widows as an order from which the deaconesses were often chosen, though the virgins were to be preferred for that office [VI. xvii. 1]. "If any younger woman who hath lived only a little while with her husband, and hath lost him by death or by some other occasion, remain by herself, having the gift of widowhood (δῶρον χηρείας), she will be found blessed" [iii. 1]. But, as a rule, length of widowhood or age was required before they could make their profession. "If she (i.e. the widow) have lost her husband a long time ago, and have lived chastely and unblameably, and have well cared for her own household, like Judith and Anna, those illustrious ones, let her be reckoned among the number of the widows: but if she have only lately lost her husband let her not be trusted," &c. [viii. 25]. To the same effect, too, in the quasi-Ignatian Epistle to the Philippians we find a salutation to the "company of virgins and the band of widows" (τὸ σύστημα τῶν παρθένων, τὸ τάγμα τῶν χηρῶν). The rules for the admission of widows necessarily varied at different times. Tertullian implies that a widow who had not borne children was inadmissible—"ad quam sedem præter annos sexaginta non tantum univiræ, id est, nuptæ, aliquando eliguntur, sed et matres et quidem educatrices filiorum" [De Virg. Veland. c. ix.]. There was also a law of Theodosius to the same effect, but Bingham shews [Antiq. ii. 22] that the Church varied in practice in this particular. The rule of age also could not be constantly kept. Justinian mentions fifty or even forty as sufficient. But one qualification was most strictly required, viz. to have been the wife of but one husband.[1] So Tertullian, "Viduam adlegi in ordinationem nisi univiram non concedit" [ad Uxor. lib. i. c. 7].

The duties of the widows were similar to those of the deaconesses, and from their ranks the deaconesses were in part recruited. We read of their ministering to those in prison, and collecting the offerings of the faithful for the distressed. As a body they were presided over by the deaconesses, who were on that account called προκαθημέναι.

There was a difference in the ceremonies attending the consecration of widows and virgins. From the first priests were allowed to receive the vows of, and give the veil to, widows. Gelasius [A.D. 492-496] forbids the veiling of widows at any time, "quod nec auctoritas divina delegat, nec canonum forma præstituit" [Ep. ix. ad Episc. Lucan. c. 13]. Certainly, from the fifth century, bishops are strictly forbidden to perform this ceremony. But in the Roman rite "De Consecratione Viduæ" the widow is to be veiled by a priest, or to receive from the altar a veil consecrated by the bishop, and veil herself ("et ipsa sibi, non episcopus, illud debet imponere"). The reason is to be found in the manifestly lower spiritual position of the widow as compared with the virgin. The Church always paid more honour to the estate of virginity, but the corruptions by which Christianity was surrounded were so great that it was necessary at first to lay very great restrictions upon those who professed the religious life; nor was it until the leaven of the Gospel had worked a great change in the world that those restrictions could be relaxed.

[1] Second marriages were only tolerated in the Primitive Church, a third marriage the Apostolic Constitutions say "shews great intemperance," and a fourth is "προφανὴς πορνεία καὶ ἀσέλγεια ἀναμφίβολος" [bk. iii. c. 2].

In the course of a few centuries the widows, together with the allied class of deaconesses, disappear from history. They were often found in the convents of later ages, but not as a distinct order, and, whatever their value to the community, were never invested with the special veil of the virgins. [Bingham, Antiq. bk. ii. c. 22, and bk. vii. c. 4. Apostolic Constitutions, bks. iii. and viii.].

WORD, THE [Ὁ Λόγος]. A mystical title of the Second Person in the Blessed Trinity, the Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ.

The most conspicuous use of this title is in the writings of St. John. His Gospel opens with the declaration "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by Him; and without Him was not anything made that was made. In Him was life; and the life was the light of men. And the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not. . . . . And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the Only Begotten of the Father,) full of grace and truth" [John i. 1-5, 14]. In the beginning of his first Epistle St. John also writes of "The Word of life" of which he and others had knowledge by their senses [1 John i. 1, 2]. In the Apocalypse the same Apostle describes the Saviour in mystical terms, and adds, "He was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood; and His Name is called, The Word of God" [Rev. xix. 13].

The manner in which this peculiar expression is used clearly marks it out as the designation of a Person; taking it out of the range of common language into that of special, technical, ecclesiastical or theological language. Thus the common idea of speech which is associated with a word, is not the primary notion set forth by the expression as used by St. John in this case, but is subordinated to that of Personality. [1] "The Word was with God" conveys the idea of one Person being with another Person, and not that of a verbal sound, a thought, or a manifestation of will being with Him. [2] The Word is represented as a personal Creator, "All things were made by Him, and without Him was not anything made that was made." [3] The Word is declared to have a Divine Personality, "The Word was God." [4] The Word is said to have assumed human nature, "The Word was made [ἐγένετο] flesh, and dwelt among us." Whatever meaning, therefore, may underlie, or be comprehended in, this expression, no attention is drawn to that meaning by the writer, nor does he give any more indication of it than may be deduced from the expression itself. St. John simply dissociates it from its ordinary use, adopts it as a title of the Person respecting whom he writes, and leaves all explanation of the title to be ascertained, if at all, from other sources of information than the particular statements in the course of which it occurs. Such a mode of writing can only be accounted for in one of three ways: either by the supposition that the writer was using language so extremely familiar to his readers that no explanation was needed; or by the supposition that the explanation could be elsewhere found; or by the supposition that the expression contained a mystery which it was not intended, at that time, to reveal.

That "The Word" was familiar to Jews or Gentiles, as the title of a Person, is not proved, and is not at all probable. Some consider that Psa. xxxiii. 6, "By the Word of the Lord were the heavens made," or Psa. cxix. 89, "For ever, O Lord, Thy Word is settled in Heaven," were familiar examples of such a designation. But although "The Word" in these passages may now be properly interpreted of the Son of God, there is no proof that the Jews so understood them. Such an understanding has come upon us with the light of a later theology than theirs: and if, therefore, St. John adopted the title because he found it in the Psalms, he could not have adopted it because the meaning he intended was already familiar to the readers of those Psalms. Another Jewish origin for it has been found in "Memra," the Hebrew equivalent of Λόγος, which was substituted by the Scribes for the Sacred Tetragrammaton in their Targums and perhaps in their copies of the Old Testament books. But the most learned men have concluded that there is little probability in the supposition that "Memra" was used by the Jews with any reference to the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity.

Another set of critics trace out a heathen origin for the Λόγος of St. John, ὁ Λόγος holding a prominent place as a manifestation of, or emanation from, the Supreme Being, in the theological system of Plato: and this theory has been adopted so generally that it is perhaps difficult to convince one's mind of the extreme unreasonableness that there is in the supposition. Yet it is most unreasonable. For when the phrase was first used by the Apostle, he had not been long a resident in a Gentile land, and it is very improbable that he had become acquainted with Plato's writings. He had been for many years before the guardian of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and having attained manhood when he was called an "ignorant and unlearned" man, it is very improbable that either his office, his inclination, or his intellectual gifts (for he would hardly read Plato by miracle) would have suffered him to acquire such familiarity then, or during the few years of his residence at Ephesus, with the philosopher's writings as to make him introduce the expression as it is introduced in the Revelation; and that, too, when he was writing in Patmos, where he was little likely to have a volume of Plato to refer to.

Moreover, in this first mention of "The Word" there is nothing of philosophy, and it is beyond all rational belief that St. John should take an idea out of the book of a philosophical heathen and apply it in the personal manner in which he has used the term in the Gospel and the Apocalypse. That he should take it out of a heathen writer and apply it to Christ is equally incredible. And almost as incredible is it that he should master the Timæus of Plato, so far as to be able thus to use his terminology in a familiar manner in one particular instance, and yet not to use it for any other purpose.[1]

The improbability of a Christian Apostle, and one of whom there is no reason to predicate much learning, thus abruptly borrowing a term of heathen philosophy is so great that a connecting link has been supposed between St. John and Plato in the Gnostics or in the Jew Philo. But there is no evidence whatever to indicate this, and the Logos of Philo is a mere abstract idea, not a Person as is the Logos of St. John. [Dorner's Person of Christ. Döllinger's Jew and Gentile, x. 3. Burton's Ante-Nicene Fathers, Lect. vii., notes 90, 93].

A much more reasonable way of accounting for the use of this term is by supposing that St. John was inspired to adopt it as expressive of what he intended to convey by means of it, a knowledge of the relation between God the Father and God the Son. Thus St. Augustine explains that "the Son is called the Word of God, because His Father makes known His Will by Him, in the same manner that a man makes known his mind by words." This explanation has the advantage of being applicable to the senses "Reason" and "Definition," which Λόγος will bear in addition to that of "Word;" and most of what the Fathers have left on the subject is an expansion of St. Augustine's idea.

The primary object of St. John's prologue is, however, assuredly not that of setting forth the relation which exists between the Father and the Son, but that of exhibiting the Person of the Son Himself in Its most exalted phase as the foundation of his whole Gospel and Theology. None of the theories above referred to, nor all combined, seem to offer anything like a complete explanation of the manner in which the title came from the Apostle's pen: and all analogies founded on St. Augustine's theory, or any other, are rather to be taken as illustrations than explanations. There seems reason to believe that there is a mystery in the application of this name ὁ Λόγος to the Second Person in the Holy Trinity, which neither patristic nor other explanations and analogies have ever penetrated; and that when we have established the identity of the Word with the Son of God, we have gone as far as we were intended to go by the Inspirer of the Gospel, and try in vain to shew why the Son of God is named the Word and is the Word. That the holy Name Jehovah contains a mystery not wholly explained by the Eternal Being indicated in the inspired explanation "I AM," is a very common opinion: and it seems quite likely that an analogous mystery should attach itself to the distinctive Name of God the Son. In Isaiah ix. 6, it is expressly said that His Name shall be called "Wonderful," and the Hebrew word so translated is the same [פֶּלֶא] as is translated "Secret" in Judges xiii. 18, "Why askest thou thus after My Name, seeing it is secret?" In Rev. xix. 12, it is also said of One Whom no one can doubt to be the Son of God Incarnate, that "He had a name written, that no man knew but He Himself," which mysterious name, to be understood by no man until its meaning is revealed, appears to be the same referred to in the following verse, —"And His Name shall be called the Word of God." This all seems to make it probable that "The Word" is a "New Name" [Rev. iii. 12], assumed by the Son of God Incarnate with reference to His Eternal Individual Existence, but that there is a Mystery in It which will not be wholly, if at all, laid open until the time when we shall "know in part" no longer, and see no more "as through a glass, darkly." It seems sufficient for us to know certainly that the Word is a Person, eternally co-existing with the Father, by which Word all things were made; contented to believe that what lies hidden under that Name is not yet known; nor therefore, why it is used as it is by St. John.

But though the Name must thus, probably, remain inexplicable, a Mystery from first to last, the Person to Whom that Name is applied is too clearly indicated to allow of any doubt: and some of the attributes thus given by St. John as proper to that Person are stated in language which can only bear one straightforward meaning, attaching to Him the notions of a distinct Personality, an Eternal Being, and a Creative Power.

WORD, WRITTEN. A usual title of Holy Scripture. In 2 Pet. i. 19 we have τὸν προφητικὸν λόγον. St. Luke [iii. 4] refers to "the Book of the words (λόγων) of Esaias the prophet;" and by this term (λόγος) he designates his Gospel [Acts i. 1]. In full, what is understood is "the Word of God:"—"The seed is the Word of God" [Luke viii. 11; cf. St. Mark vii. 13; Acts xix. 20; 2 Tim. iv. 2]. For the distinction between ὁ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ, "the Word written" [Heb. iv. 12]; and τὸ ῥῆμα τοῦ Θεοῦ, or the energy of the Spirit of God [Eph. vi. 17], see Lee on Inspiration, 4th ed. pp. 135, 539.

WORKS. It may seem to belong to ethics rather than to theology to answer, or attempt to answer, the primary question, "What is the distinguishing quality common to all right actions?" But the following preliminaries bearing on this question are necessary to a theological consideration of the subject of works.

[1] In a few words, Plato's theory of the Logos was that it was mind or reason generated from or by τὸ Ἀγαθὸν, and yet self-subsisting; that it contained the seminal principles of all existing things, and the original οὐσία of them all. He seems to have spoken of it as eternal, but does not appear to have attributed personality to it. Hagenbach considers that the relation between Plato's νοῦς or λόγος and God presents a very remote analogy to that of St. John [Hist. Doct. sec. 40].

To give an action the character of right or wrong there must be in the doer of it ability to comprehend the nature of the action, and freedom at least of abstaining from the action. Where there is no understanding there is no responsibility; and the sinfulness of sins of ignorance is in proportion to the wilfulness of the ignorance.

Supposing then a competent understanding, the actions for which man is responsible proceed from the will. If we assert that involuntary actions are blameless, the proposition must be guarded by the statement that although the particular action be involuntary, it may proceed from a habit formed by previous acts of the will, and if so, must partake of the guilt of those acts. Thus evil thoughts in sleep may be only the continuation of the evil thoughts of the day. Voluntary actions may proceed immediately from the will, when the mind which wills does also itself act, as in loving, hating. These are called "elicit" actions. Or they may proceed from the will mediately, when the will commands another agent, as in outward deeds. These are called "imperate"[1] actions.

To judge of actions, whether it be when the mind reflecting on itself judges its own actions, or when one man judges the actions of another, there must be a rule. This rule must contain, more or less developed, the eternal and immutable principles of right and wrong, which exist in their perfection in the bosom of the Creator.[2] Rejecting the heresy which lays the foundation of morality in will, which teaches, with Ockam, that moral evil is only evil because it is prohibited, we know that God wills only that which is just; and that when He has spoken we have an infallible standard and guide. With what degree of certainty we know the will of God, with the same certainty we know the quality of actions.

Man without revelation is left to the traditionary inheritance of a knowledge of right and wrong divinely imparted at the beginning, or he is left to find that knowledge by the use of God's gift of reason. He has then only the exercise of his natural conscience, and the standard of that law which he is to himself [Rom. ii. 14]. See Butler, Sermons on Human Nature, ii. iii.].

When the mind is enlightened by a revelation of God's will, cleansed by the blood of Christ, and quickened by the grace of God, then there is the enlightened conscience of the spiritual man which knows all things and judges all things.

In judging actions the supreme conscience finds that an action good in all external circumstances may be really bad, from the evil of the motive which led to it. To relieve a distressed woman is externally good, to do so for the purpose of gaining her goodwill as the first step to seduction is bad. It finds further that a good purpose (supposing that such can really exist) cannot transform a bad action into a good one. To commit fraud for the purpose of building a church does not make the fraud justifiable. It finds also that the external consequences of an action cannot obliterate any evil attaching to the beginning of the action. It is easy to conceive money borrowed upon false security, that money successfully employed in establishing a business which spreads prosperity and happiness through a whole town, the money punctually repaid, and the security destroyed. The conscience quickly decides that the good consequences do not obliterate the original deceit.

These several cases shew that to constitute a good action the will must proceed according to immutable principles, which when expressed in law will not endure any transgression.

We may describe good actions, then, as those which proceed from a will acting in accordance with right reason which seeks out what is Divine, or with a revelation which declares what is Divine. [See Liguori, Theol. Moralis. lib. v., De actibus humanis in genere, art. i. ii.; Mackintosh, Dissert. on Ethical Philosophy, particularly the remarks on Butler, p. 347.]

The remark just now made that actions cannot be judged by their external consequences leads to the thought that there are internal consequences which if ascertainable would be sure tests of the action. All actions carry with them a just retribution in their effects upon the heart and mind. The righteous and the wicked eat of the fruit of their own ways, and are filled with their own devices.[3] Outwardly, there is sufficient exemplification of this law for the discipline and instruction of man [see Mede's Sermon on "As I have done so hath God requited me"], inwardly the law is without exception. But it is only partially that we can trace the inward working of this law; and for the door of the wrong action, the very deed weakens the power of discerning its consequence.[1] This retributive effect of every action is included in our Lord's beatitudes and woes [Matt. v.; Luke vi.], as well as the reward which God may assign to each, accesses of glory or of pain, not deducible from the action itself.

[1] Antinomianism must deny that these actions are imperate, that they proceed from, or are commanded by, the will.

[2] We may here ask, whether ethics as distinguished from theology can give an answer to the primary question as to the distinguishing quality of right and wrong, and whether, reference being made to theology, the question must not be thrown back upon the original mystery of the Self-existence of God. God is because He is. "I am that (because) I am" is His Name. God is goodness. Goodness is, because God is. The pre-existence of the ideas of right and wrong in the eternal intellect is the foundation of the immutable nature of morality. So the Schoolmen generally taught. Right is right, not because God has commanded it, but because it corresponds to the nature of God; and, because it so corresponds, God has commanded it. Right actions, then, are those which correspond to the Divine Nature. Ethics is defined as the seeking out those rules and measures of human actions which lead to happiness, and the means to practise them. The happiness or greatness of man is in conformity to the Divine Nature. Right actions attain it by raising a man above himself to God. See Lord Bacon's Advancement of Learning, bk. i. (on the Creation and Fall) and Confession of Faith (on the Fall); noticing that in the former Bacon speaks the language of Ockam, "God's commandments and prohibitions are the originals of good and evil:" in the latter he calls them "the rules of good and evil." In both he finds the Fall to be the attempt to know good and evil in their own principles and beginnings independently of God.

[3] See Prov. xiv. 14; Gal. vi. 7, where in ver. 7 the kind of seed is spoken of, in ver. 8 the nature of the ground. The soils are as entirely different as are the seeds.

From this counterpart of woes to beatitudes it may be inferred that every proposition regarding good works will have its correlative proposition regarding evil works. It will be necessary to give only those propositions which relate to good works. Their correlatives in the opposite will be easily supplied. If he that soweth to the spirit shall of the spirit reap life everlasting, he that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption.

The doctrine of the Church of England concerning works are found in articles X.-XVI.; these being eminently controversial articles. The several controversies and the terms used in the articles are noticed under the titles FREE-WILL, FAITH, GRACE, JUSTIFICATION, MERIT. Referring to the statements there made regarding the several topics connected with the doctrine of works, we have now to notice—

I. Concerning works in general, [1] that in no case can good works be done without the grace of God. Here we take the term grace in its widest sense. Man unassisted can neither will nor do what is right. But God has in no case left Himself without witness, and His Spirit, though in very different degrees, strives with all men. Supernatural aid therefore is never wanting. [2] If we take the term merit in the sense which is now generally thought to be its proper sense, namely, to signify a claim upon another created by the rendering of services, which services might without blame have been withheld, then no created being can merit ought of the Creator. Such a claim can only be constituted in the respects in which the agent and the recipient are independent of each other. But the old Church use[2] of the word merit is very different, and according to it, merit signifies the fulfilment of the conditions which God has annexed to His promises, and the claim implied is not a claim of desert, but a claim of faith for the accomplishment of mercy. In speaking of Hosea's words, "Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy," the harvest of mercy would have been said to be merited by the sowing.

II. Concerning good works before baptism, [1] of those to whom Christ has not been preached. These are pleasant to God (our thirteenth Article does not refer to them), and are preparatory to baptism, both as fitting the agent for its reception and as fulfilling the condition upon which God has promised more grace. The example of Cornelius is an indisputable proof. If the case has existed of such good works done, but not met by the grace of a higher revelation, we can only say, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" and that we cannot conceive the agent of such works suffering for want of the revelation which he would have obeyed had it been made to him. [2] Concerning the works, ostensibly good, of those who are unbaptized, to whom Christ has been preached. This is the case contemplated in our thirteenth Article. From the very nature of the case the words of the Article must be limited to those who continue in wilful rejection of the Gospel; for otherwise we should have the intolerable assertion that the prayers and alms of a sincere catechumen are not part of the repentance which rightly precedes baptism. Such works of a catechumen spring from an inchoate faith in Christ, they are pleasant to God, they are preparatory to baptism in the two ways before named, no less than the prayers and alms of Cornelius.

Like things may be said, in a lower degree, of those whose want of baptism is owing to inadequate or erroneous teaching. But with those to whom the Gospel has been adequately preached, and who wilfully reject baptism, the case is altogether and essentially different. They are not seeking for grace, but have rejected it when offered. Their actions, ostensibly good, are therefore not the fulfilment of the conditions on which grace is promised, and do not deserve grace of congruity. The actions do not spring from faith in Jesus Christ, not even from the undefined beginnings of an inchoate faith: they are not a part of the repentance which precedes baptism, and do not make the doers meet to receive the grace of baptism. The adoption of sons has been refused; the actions which God wills to be the actions of sons are the actions of aliens, and therefore have the nature of sin. It does not follow, however, that they are altogether sin. The Gospel does not countermand the principles of natural justice and philanthropy; and works done in obedience to those principles, although sinful in respect of the grace refused, may yet have the merit of the lower grade. Although they do not of congruity deserve the grace of baptism, nor make men meet for it, they may make men meet for the grace of repentance.

It is contrary to the whole tenor of Scripture, which represents every act of obedience,[3] however imperfect, as always met by God's mercy, to say that the man who does acts of justice and kindness is not nearer to true repentance than the man who rejects them. If our thirteenth Article be taken in the rigid and unlimited sense which some assign to it, it is open to the objection that God in commanding such works to be done has commanded sin, and that it leads to the conclusion, which indeed some have not hesitated to adopt, that morality is a hindrance to conversion.

[1] Isa. vi. 10; Matt. xiii. 14; Acts xxviii. 26; Rom. xi. 8.

[2] Thus Tertullian [Scorpiac. c. vi. p. 622, ed. 1641], "Aut quomodo multæ mansiones apud Patrem, si non pro varietate meritorum? quomodo et stella a stella distabit in gloria, nisi pro diversitate radiorum? Porro, et si fidei propterea congruebat sublimitatis et claritatis aliqua prolatio, tale quid esse oportuerat illud emolumenti, quod magno constaret labore, cruciatu, tormento, morte." Here the "merit" is the appropriateness that the greater faith receives the greater brightness. "Et ut peccatricis pœnitentia, secundum creatorem meruerit veniam præponere solitum sacrificio," where the woman's justification by faith is spoken of. [Adv. Marc. iv. p. 531.]

[3] The principle stated John vii. 17 is perfectly general, and embraces the earliest attempts at obedience. See 1 Kings xxi. 27-29; Deut. xxx. 4-6.

III. The works of the Gospel then, works after baptism, are the only works that are in the highest sense called good. Grace higher in kind, not only in degree, is given by Jesus Christ, and a righteousness of a higher strain is accordingly required. Such good works are necessary to salvation; there can be no true faith without them, for they spring naturally from faith, it is of the very nature of faith to produce them: the faith that justifies is the faith that includes them, so that "they may be said to justify or not, according as they are in our minds associated or contrasted with faith:" they produce more grace, and one result of them is the knowledge of God's doctrine; in doing them it is lawful to have respect to the recompense of the reward: and finally they are, although imperfect, accepted of God's mercy in Christ as if they were perfect, so that, as the sufferings of saints are the filling up of that which is behind in the afflictions of Christ, the righteousness of saints is the completion of the righteousness of Christ in His mystical Body.

WORSHIP. This word is derived from the older English weorð-scipe, which is itself formed from "worth," the equivalent of "honour." It was used until recent times for honour paid to human persons as well as, or even more than, for honour paid to the Divine Persons. In the old Manuals of the Church of England the words of betrothal were "wyth myne body ych the honoure," but "God that commandest to worschipe thi fadir and thi moder," and "if ony man serue me, my fadir schul worschipe him," are found in Wickliffe's Bible at the end of the fourteenth century; while, in the "Liber Festivalis," every gentleman's house is called a "place of worship," as every gentleman was once addressed by his inferiors by the same title "your worship," which is still used for justices of the peace.

In more recent English a distinctive sense equivalent to λατρεία has been given to the word by means of the prefix "Divine," and it is frequently used without that prefix in the same sense in popular language. For want of attention, however, to the old usage, the "worship of the Saints" has often been confused with Divine Worship, and thus wrongly identified with Idolatry.

WORSHIP DIVINE. [ADORATION. PRAYER. RITUAL.]

WRATH OF GOD. The word wrath is used for both the θυμὸς and the ὀργή of the New Testament. Where these words occur together the former is rendered indignation or fierceness. Θυμὸς is properly the outward manifestation, ὀργή the inward feeling. [See Trench, New Test. Syn. ser. i. sect. xxxviii.] But the distinction is not always adhered to. [See Septuag. Psa. lxxvii. 49.]

"God's wrath is not as ours, the trouble of a mind disturbed and disquieted with things amiss, but a calm, unpassionate, and just assignation of dreadful punishment to be their portion which have disobeyed." [Hooker (from Augustine) Ecc. Pol. VI. v. 4.] So Chrysostom, Ὀργὴ γὰρ τοῦ Θεοῦ, οὐ πάθος ἀλλὰ τιμωρία καὶ κόλασις [Hom. in Psa. vii.]

The wrath of God then is, first, the judicial condemnation or disapprobation of sin; secondly, the consequent punishment. It is one side of God's justice, which renders to every man according to their deeds, that side which renders to them that are contentious indignation and wrath.

In declaring justice as an attribute of God, the Scriptures, more frequently perhaps than in any other case, employ terms which when used of men imply passion and emotion. Without these a sense of the strength of God's disapprobation of sin could not be given. God is grieved, wearied, fretted by sin: He hates, He abhors sin: sin stirs up indignation and wrath. Another point in which we must be careful not to think of God as we think of man, is, that with Him to Whom time cannot be attributed, the condemnation and the punishment of sin go together. "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt die." With us time is an element. "Adam lived nine hundred and thirty years."

During the whole time of their impenitence sinners are under the wrath (ὀργὴ) of God, being by nature children of wrath; although such only as stumble at the Word, being disobedient, are appointed unto wrath. Throughout the period of long-suffering the revelation of righteous judgment is delayed, to give time for the repentance which satisfies God, and changes His indignation and wrath into mercy.

God's punishments are twofold, punishments of discipline, and punishments of recompence. The former are remedial acts of mercy; and the threatenings they contain are warnings to flee from the wrath to come. "Cum Deus evertit subsidium vitiorum, et copiosas libidines inopes reddit, misericorditer adversatur." "Nihil est infelicius felicitate peccantium, quâ pœnalis nutritur impunitas, et mala voluntas velut hostis interior" [Augustine, Epist. cxxxviii. ad Marcell.]. Such being their character, they are not necessarily remitted upon repentance. Their continuance is only a continuance of the same mercy which at first inflicted them, designed, it may be, to make repentance more complete, to prevent a return to sin, or for example to others, or to reprove the scandal which had been given. [See Num. xii. 1-14, xx. 1, xxvii. 12-14; 2 Sam. xii. 14; Isa. xxvi. 9, 10.]

Punishments of the latter kind, namely those of recompence, are alone to be attributed properly to God's Wrath. The former contained indeed the judicial condemnation of sin, but they flowed from the meeting of mercy and truth, of righteousness and peace. The latter are when the time of mercy and peace is past. They flow from God's "justitia vindicativa." This attribute of God is, in language borrowed (as noticed before) from human actions and emotions, stated to be vengeance [Rom. xii. 19; 2 Thess. i. 8]. In regard to it God is declared to be, in His Nature, a consuming fire. In behalf of the righteousness of God, who thus deals with sinners, man's conscience may be safely appealed to. So St. Paul makes the appeal, Rom. iii. 6.

Temporal punishments are for the most part to be referred to the former class, but the world has seen some signal instances of recompence or vengeance. When God's Spirit could no longer strive with the old world, when the cry of the cities of the plain rose to heaven, when the iniquity of the Amorite was at its full, the vengeance came. In such cases the ministers of vengeance may be men or angels; or the vengeance may fall in what we call the natural order of God's providence. But in the final day of vengeance the Son Himself will be the minister of wrath [2 Thess. i. 7; Rev. vi. 16]. And the retribution which came on the Holy City is spoken of, as an anticipation of that day, as the coming of the Son of Man.

All such punishments due in revenge of sin, whether temporal or eternal, are remitted upon repentance [Matt. xii. 41]. The satisfaction of Christ makes our repentance acceptable; He was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him.

This leads us, in the last place, to the question, How far it can be correctly said that our Lord bore the wrath of God. "Clearly the likeness between fallen man and our Lord Jesus Christ has of necessity limits which cannot be overpassed." [See Blunt's Atonement, p. 88.]

The pains of an evil conscience, the inward retribution which follows as the natural consequence of every sin, He Who had no sin could not feel. Nor could He Who not only had no sin, but was in obedience offering Himself an acceptable sacrifice to God, have a sense of the judicial disapprobation of God. But the outward manifestations of God's wrath, so far as they were then exhibited (for before the last day hell is not), He Who was made sin did bear. Fearfulness and trembling came upon Him, and an horrible dread overwhelmed Him, when God hid His face from Him, and He was troubled. So far He bore the wrath of the Father, that we might inherit the Father's favour.

X

XEROPHAGIA. Xerophagia, or the exclusive use of dry food, is connected with the duty of fasting. It is defined by Epiphanius to be bread and salt, and is combined with restriction in the use of water for washing. "Throughout the Holy Week," he says, the "people continue to use dry food [ξηροφαγεῖν], viz. bread and salt, using water only in the evening" [Compend. Doctr. Cath.]. Tertullian in like manner connects "lavaeri abstinentiam" with the Xerophagia [Adv. Psych. i. sec. 14, 15]. The Pastor of Hermas, without exactly expressing the term, alludes to it when it is said; "illo die quo jejunabis nihil omnino gustabis nisi panem et aquam" [iii. 3]. It was the "jejunium fortissimum" of Jerome [Ep. 2].

The fiftieth canon of the Council of Laodicæa forbids the remission of fasting on the fifth day of the Holy Week, "fasting being continued throughout Lent, ξηροφαγοῦντες;" where Balsamon remarks, "not however on the Sabbaths and Sundays in Lent; for on these days we are not compelled ξηροφαγεῖν, as we are on the other days of the fast" [Can. Ap. 69]. Elsewhere he says that "not only in Lent but on the fourth and sixth days of the week we are expected ξηροφαγεῖν, fish alone being permissible;" to which however others added fowl, because in the Mosaic account of creation birds seem to have been formed from water [Gen. i. 20, and Soer. H. E. v. 22].

Y

YEAR. The present arrangement of the ecclesiastical year is one which has grown up and developed during the course of a long time, representing the wisdom of successive ages. As "to everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the sun," so to each of the great events of Christian times there has gradually been assigned a day or period of commemoration.

It could not but be that the anniversaries of the chief events of our Lord's life, and of the day on which the Holy Ghost came down upon the Church would be observed by His disciples. The days on which He died, rose, and ascended into heaven—the day on which they were themselves "endued with powers from on high" would ever stand out as prominent marks of the ecclesiastical year.

Accordingly it is not surprising to find that one of the very earliest questions debated in the Church was as to the time of keeping Easter. As early as A.D. 158, St. Polycarp, the disciple of St. John, went to consult Anicetus at Rome on this question, and the controversy which they could not settle was brought to a close by the Council of Nicæa.

Similar early testimony may be found to other festivals and solemn days. Good Friday must have been kept from the very first—the anniversary of the Lord's Death could never have been forgotten. So too we find St. Epiphanius speaking of St. Paul as keeping the feast of Pentecost, and quoting Acts xx. 16 in that connection [Hæres. lxxv., Aerian. vi.]. We find notices of the Epiphany as early as A.D. 200 [St. Clem. Alex. Opp. i. 408]; and of Ascension Day. St. Augustine observes that it, with other anniversary solemnities, was either instituted by the Apostles themselves or by plenary councils [Ep. liv. al. cxviii. ad Januar.].

Next after these, called by St. Proclus "days which the Lord hath made" [Orat. iii.], there arose the commemorations of the saints and martyrs of the Lord's Church. These are of very high antiquity. Eusebius records [Ecc. Hist. iv. 15] the epistle of the Church of Smyrna to the Church of Philomelium, relating the martyrdom of St. Polycarp [A.D. 168]. In this Epistle the Christians of Smyrna tell their brethren where the martyr's body was entombed, and how they intended, by God's permission, to assemble at that place, and celebrate his birthday (the beginning of his heavenly life) with joy and gladness.

The festival of St. Peter is traced back to the third century [Reinart, 617], and no doubt was observed much earlier as a festival of SS. Peter and Paul. Origen names the commemoration of the Holy Innocents [Hom. iii. de diversis] and St. Chrysostom the "Festival of all the martyrs," which was kept on the octave of Pentecost [Hom. lxxiv. de Martyr. totius Orbis].

In course of time moreover, other festivals were introduced; such as the Encænia, or Feasts of Dedication of Churches, mentioned by Sozomen and others, and doubtless in analogy with the Jewish feast named in John x. 22. Bishops were also wont to keep the anniversaries of their consecrations, and particular churches had special days of thanksgiving for great mercies and deliverances vouchsafed to them from God. Ordination was gradually limited to the Ember seasons, that thus there might be a special time of united prayer and fasting on behalf of the newly ordained. In certain parts of the year marriages were forbidden. Durandus gives these as from Advent Sunday to Epiphany, from Septuagesima to the octave of Easter, three weeks before the feast of St. John, and from Rogation Sunday to Trinity Sunday. The especial times for baptism were Epiphany, Easter, and Whitsuntide, but chiefly the two latter. During certain festal seasons kneeling at prayers was prohibited, e.g. from Easter to Whitsuntide inclusive by the twentieth canon of Nicæa. On the Lord's Day the standing posture was also adopted in memory of our Lord's Resurrection. Thus gradually were ordered and harmonized the seasons of the Church. "By the knowledge of the Lord they were distinguished: and He altered seasons and feasts. Some of them hath He made high days and hallowed them" [Ecclus. xxxiii. 8, 9].

The influence of this venerable system for good it is impossible to calculate. Not only in the services of the Church, but in the transactions of daily life the same guiding hand has been felt, the Church setting her mark upon all things. "Ecclesiastical festivals became seasons of home enjoyment; holy days were turned into holidays; the Church's children learnt, in private life, to think and to speak in the Church's way . . . the governors of the state fell almost unconsciously into the times and seasons of her who is not of this world: sheriffs were picked on the morrow of St. Martin: lawyers reckoned by Hilary or Trinity Term, every class was subject to the same moulding influence. . . . It was the same influence always and everywhere at work; sometimes beautifully, sometimes amusingly, sometimes extravagantly, but always most really. The Church, whatever her language, was herself vernacular." [Neale, Essays, &c., p. 508.]

Z

ZABIANISM, or astrolatry, has been derived by Pococke from the Aramaic root sabá, the heavenly host, from which same root SABIANISM is taken, but in the different sense of "to change religion," Sabianism being of a very versatile complexion, a syncretic fusion of the Magian, Parsee, and Christian systems. It is of this latter form of religion, doubtless, that Mahomet speaks in the Korân [Sur. ii. 29, v. 73, and xxii. 17], where he describes the religious systems of the world as Moslem, Jewish, Sabian, Christian, Magian, and Polytheistic. According to this arrangement the Sabians were monotheistic. But the Zabians were idolaters, dwelling in the north of Mesopotamia, in the biblical Haran. An Arabic Christian writer, quoted by Chwolsohn [die Ssabier und der Ssabismus, ii. 14], says that they adopted the name of Zabian as being a religion tolerated by the Korân, and so escaped the persecution to which their star-worship would have exposed them, and the account is by no means improbable. As they in no sense affected Christian doctrine, the subject may be dismissed with this notice of their non-identity with the Sabians. They first gave planetary names to the days of the week; the feast day of each planet being determined by the time of its culmination; hence also the alchemists of the Middle Ages, and through them heralds, have borrowed the notion of assigning a particular metal and a particular colour to the several planets. In common with other Aramaic races they had a civil year, which began like the Jewish Rosh hashanah in autumn, and an ecclesiastical year commencing at the vernal equinox. Before the time of Mahomet they offered human sacrifices to the deities which they believed were embodied in the planets. A full and interesting account is found in Petersen's article "Zabier" in Herzog, drawn from Chwolsohn, and from Arabic and Persian notices of this sect.

ZWINGLIANISM. The system of polity and doctrine peculiar to the community of Zurich, when under Zwingli it separated itself from the obedience of Rome. From the conception of Zwinglianism must be excluded, on the one hand, that which Zwingli had in common with other reformers; and on the other hand his private opinions, which were not accepted by the community of Zurich. The system may be defined as that which, merging the state in the Church, turns the Church into a spiritual republic, without a priesthood, and with bare signs instead of sacraments.

Theoretically, Zwingli did not view the community in its two capacities, civil and ecclesiastical, and recognise accordingly, as belonging to it, two independent jurisdictions, temporal and spiritual: the community to him was a Church and nothing else. His magistrates were church-officers, deriving their authority equally with the ministry from the body of the faithful, and distinguished from them only by the character of the work which a division of labour assigned to each. Practically, the inevitable result was that which is usually stated to be the system of Zwingli, namely, that the sovereignty in spiritual as well as in temporal matters was vested in the civic authorities of each community.

Further, the Church was considered to be a congregation of faithful men, without including in the definition any provision for the rightful ministration of the Word and Sacraments, and therefore without provision for centres of external unity. Beginning with the principle that every one is at liberty to preach (preaching being the chief function of the ministry), some form of mission from the Church was soon found necessary for order's sake; but to the last all notion of priesthood, of holy orders, was rejected. Accordingly, the exercise of the keys was nothing more than this general preaching of the gospel, and the power of excommunication was vested in the magistrates. In Zwingli's theology sacraments are mere signs of initiation and of a pledge to continue in the outward society: they confer no grace, they minister no faith, they do not free the conscience; they are not even pledges of grace, they are tokens rather to the Church of the disposition of the recipient than to the recipient of his sonship in Christ.

This system was in some measure modified by Bullinger, who introduced something approaching to a recognition of a clerisy and of efficacy in sacraments; and again the influence of the Geneva ministers added to the Zurich doctrine of the Lord's Supper something of that Calvinistic teaching regarding receiving the Body and Blood of Christ, which is at least an approximation to Catholic truth [see Mosheim, Hist. v. p. 364, and Maclaine's note]. It was Swiss theology, so modified by Bullinger, that found advocates in England. Hooper was a faithful follower of Bullinger. Peter Martyr, Laski, Dryander, Ochin were on the same side, and with them acted most of the party of Marian exiles who had been received with much hospitality at Zurich. Hoadly's doctrine of the Lord's Supper is not distinguishable from Zwingli's. [Zwingli's Works by Gualter, 1544-5, particularly the treatises Expositio Fidei Christianæ, De vera et falsa religione, Ecclesiastes, Archeteles; Basle Confession [1536] and Helvetic Confession [1566] in Sylloge Confess. Oxf. 1827. Liturgia Tigurina, Engl. transl., London 1693.]

INDEX.

Abaddon, a name of Satan, 676
Abbot, formed from Abba, 2
Abbot, synonymous with Archimandrite, 41
Abelard and Realism, 137
Abelard, theology of, 747
Absolution an element of repentance, 640
Absolution in Old Testament, 3
Abstinence, days of, 274
Abstinence, total, 4
Acolythes, 131
Acolyth, order of, 527
Action, relation of doubt to, 219
Act of Submission, 722
Act of Supremacy, 722
Acts, Synodal, collections of, 727
Act, Toleration, 756
Actual Jurisdiction, 381
Adam, the Second, 338, 459
Adam, a type of Christ, 768
Advent, Second, 682
Æschylus, on evil, 675, n.
Aërius, on bishops and presbyters, 86
Aëtians, 44
Aëtius, and Arianism, 8
Aëtius, and Gloria Patri, 291
Affections, faith partly of the, 267
Affections, heart the ideal seat of, 302
Africa, Church of South, 485
Agde, Council of, 200
Ages, Dark, 182
Ahriman the counterpart of Sammael, 101
"Αιδης, translated "hell," 305
Αἰώνιος, 258
Aix-la-Chapelle, Council of, 286
Alcuin, and Adoptionism, 6
Alcuin, on Diptychs, 203
Alcuin, on Transubstantiation, 761
Alexander of Alexandria, and Apostolical Canons, 158, n.
Alexander of Alexandria, and Arianism, 41
Alexandria, Council of, 162
Allatius, Leo, on variations in Missa Præsanctificatorum, 478
Alogi, a name for Monarchians, 487
Alombrados, 323
Altars, use of, in Primitive Church, 253, n.
Amalric of Bema, Pantheism of, 539
Ambrose, St., on Adoptionism, 6
Ambrose, St., liturgy of, 16
Ambrose, St., on Arianism, 32
Ambrose, St., on Immersion, 75
Ambrose, St., on Baptism, 77
Ambrose, St., on Apostolic Baptism, 77, n.
Ambrose, St., on Bigamy, 84
Ambrose, St., on Celibacy, 118
Ambrose, St., on Eucharistic Sacrifice, 254
Ambrose, St., account of, 282
Ambrose, St., hymns of, 318
Ambrose, St., on "Ignorance" of Christ, 323
Ambrose, St., on Lavipedium, 398
Ambrose, St., on Fasting in Lent, 408
Ambrose, St., on Marriage, 443
Ambrose, St., on Missa, 454
Ambrose, St., on Original Sin, 556
American Church, British North, 485
American Church, North, 485
Ammianus, on the destruction of libraries in the East, 183
Ammonian Canons, 110
Ammonius, of Alexandria, diatessaron of, 202
Amoraim, 476
Anabaptists, 269, 512
Anabaptism, derived from Lutheranism, 31
Anabaptists, and Almsgiving, 15
Anabaptists, and the Fifth Monarchy, 473
Anaphora, the, 424
Aneyra, Council of, 161
Andrew, St., of Crete, on the Conception of St. Anne, 328
Andrew, St., on Eucharistic Sacrifice, 253, n.
Andrewes, Bishop, on Ordination, 526
Androgynous state of man, 98
Angel, Guardian, 299
Angels and Saints, Heaven the abode of, 304
Anglican Doctrine, on Ave Maria, 72
Anglo-Saxon Versions, 791
Anointing at Baptism, 76
Anointing, in Old Testament, 121
Anointing, spiritual gifts conferred by, 121
Anomœans, 44
Anselm, on differences in Ritual, 660
Anselm, on Divine Existence, 738
Anselm, St., on the Fall of Man and of the Angels, 459
Anselm, St., on Immaculate Conception, 328
Anselm, on Original Sin, 531
Anselm, treatise of, on the Procession of the Holy Ghost, 287
Anselm, Scholastic Theology originated by, 747
Anthem, derived from Ἀντίφωνα, 32
Antichrist, and Nero, 29, n.
Antichrist, Heresy the spirit of, 306
Antidicomarians, 562
Antinomians, 296
Antioch, Councils of, 159
Antioch, Council of the Dedication, 320
Antiquity, consent of, 148
Antitacti, 296
Ἀντίθεος, 27
Apocrypha, rejected by the Jews, 108
Apollinarian error, Athanasian Creed and, 609
Apostasy, a sign of Second Advent, 685
"Apostle," the, 736
Apostles, and Gnosticism, 294
Apostles, and prayers for the dead, 586
Apostles, ordination of Bishops by, 85
Apostles, reserve enjoined upon the, 644
Apostolate, types of, in Old Testament, 36
Apostolical Church, holy character of, 517
Apostolical Church, Literæ formatæ in, 418
Apostolic labours, probable fields of, 37
Apostolic Liturgy, local developments of, 420
Apostolic Liturgy, traces of, 419
Aquinas, St. Thomas, on Baptism, 78, n.
Aquinas, on "Incomprehensible," 340
Aquinas, theology of, 748
Aquinas, on Re-ordination, 638
Aquinas, on Baptism, 346, n.
Aquinas, on Eternity, 246
Aquinas, on Hyperdulia of Christ's Human Nature, 319
Aquinas, on Immaculate Conception, 329
Aquinas, on Immersion, 75, n.
Aquinas, on Latria and Dulia, 397
Aquinas, on Marriage, 446
Aquinas, on Readers, 622
Aquinas, on the Resurrection Body, 652
Aquinas, on Schism, 682
Aquinas, on Transmutation of water in Baptism, 74, n.
Arabic Versions, 788
Archangels, 23
Archipelago, Indian, Buddhism in, 93
Aristeas, on Septuagint translation, 108, n.
Aristotle, on Evil, 262
Aristotle, on the Infinite, 346
Aristotle, on Sephiroth, 100
Aristotle, on οὐσία, 532
Arius, on Hypostasis, 319
Arius, opinions of, 41, 309
Arius, opposition to, 44
Arians, on the Pre-existence of Christ, 589, n.
Arianism contrary to Scripture, 42
Arianism, three theories of, 44, n.
Arles, Council of, 160
Arminius, account of, 46
Arminius, on Baptism, 47
Arminius, on Justification, 47

Arminius, on Lord's Supper, 47
Arminius, on Predestination, 47
Arnold, Dr., on the Epistles of St. Paul, 503
Arnold, Dr., on prophecy, 595
Arrogation, 5
Articles, and doctrine of Intention, 351
Articles, and use of images, 328
Articles, Arminianism, opposed to, 49
Articles, the Five, 48
Articles, the Six, 49
Articles, the Ten, 49
Articles, the Thirty-Nine, 49
Articles, Lambeth, 106, 394
Articles, Thirty-nine, on the descent into Hell, 201
Articles, on Grace of God, 298
Articles, on indulgences, 342
Article of 1536, on Invocation of Saints, 359
Articles, Lambeth, on Election, 235, n.
Articles, on Latitudinarianism, 395
Articles, on Opus Operatum, 524
Articles, on Original Sin, 531
Articles, on Ritual, 660
Articles, on Sacraments, 670
Articles, on Toleration, 757
Articles, on Transubstantiation, 760
Articles, on Universal Redemption, 779
Asceticism, in New Testament, 51
Ascetics, of Old Testament, 51
Aseodrutæ, 78
Asia, Buddhism in, 93
Asmodeus, identified with Abaddon, 2
Asmodeus, identified with Beelzebub, 73
Assemblies, Apostolical, 158, n.
Athanasius, St., account of, 282
Athanasius, St., and Apollinarianism, 34
Athanasius, St., and Archbishops, 40
Athanasius, St., on Arianism, 43
Athanasius, St., on Chorepiscopi, 120
Athanasius, St., on Circumincession, 129
Athanasius, St., on Deification, 190
Athanasius, St., on Faith, 18
Athanasius, St., and Gloria in Excelsis, 291
Athanasius, St., and Homoonsion, 44, n.
Athanasius, St., on Hypostasis, 320
Athanasius, St., on "Ignorance" of Christ, 323
Athanasius, St., on the Nicene Creed, 511
Athanasius, St., and New Testament Canon, 109
Athanasius, St., on οὐσία, 533
Athanasius, St., on Sabellianism, 667
Athanasius, St., on Quartodecimans, 545, n.
Atheists and Epicureans, 57
Atheism, and Holy Scriptnre, 62
Atheism, causes of, 57
Atheism, literature of, 63
Atheism of Pantheism, 537
Atomism, 59
Atonement and Regeneration, 66
Atonement, in Old Testament, 65
Auberlen, on Lutheranism, 567
Audeans, sect of, 27
Augsburg Confession, on Consubstantiation, 151, n.
Augsburg, Diet of, and Interim, 354
Augustine, St., on Adoptionism, 6
Augustine, St., on Agapæ, 9
Augustine, St., and Anthropomorphism, 27
Augustine, St., on Antichrist, 28, 29
Augustine, St., on Ascension, 50
Augustine, St., on Baptism, 74
Augustine, St., on Manichean Baptism, 74
Augustine, St., on Baptismal Grace, 78, n.
Augustine, St., on Predestination, 101, n.
Augustine, St., on Original Sin, 102
Augustine, St., on election, 103
Augustine, St., on perseverance, 103, n.
Augustine, St., on Canonization, 113
Augustine, St., on Cathari, 116
Augustine, St., on the word Church, 128
Augustine, St., on the Invisible Church, 129
Augustine, St., on clergy, 131
Augustine, St., on Competentes, 134
Augustine, St., and doctrine of congruity, 145
Augustine, St., on Creationism, 169
Augustine, St., on Traducianism, 169
Augustine, St., on Heresy, 306
Augustine, on hymns, 317, n.
Augustine, St., on worshippers of pictures, 327
Augustine, St., on "Incomprehensible," 339
Augustine, St., and Infant Baptism, 344, n., 345
Augustine, St., on unbaptized infants, 346
Augustine, St., on interpretation, 355, n.
Augustine, St., on irresistible grace, 691
Augustine, St., on Latria and Dulia, 397
Augustine, St., on Lavipedium, 398, n.
Augustine, St., on doubt, 216, 219
Augustine, St., and Dualism, 224
Augustine, St., on Predestination, 233, n.
Augustine, St., on Emanation, 238
Augustine, St., on Eternity, 246
Augustine, St., on Eucharistic Sacrifice, 254
Augustine, St., on everlasting punishment, 260, 261, n.
Augustine, St., on fasting before Communion, 272
Augnstine, St., account of, 283
Augustine, St., on free will, 290
Augustine, St., and Gnosticism, 293
Augustine, St., on the Gospels, 296, n.
Augustine, St., on Lay Baptism, 405, n.
Augustine, St., on Apostolic Litnrgy, 419, 420
Augustine, St., on the honour paid to martyrs, 448
Augustine, St., on Donatist martyrs, 448, n.
Augustine, St., and Millenarianism, 473
Augustine, St., on Mishna, 477
Augustine, St., and the Saxons of England, 481
Augustine, St., on white robes of Neophytes, 507, n.
Augustine, St., and parable, 540
Augustine, St., on Paulianists, 552
Augustine, St., on Original Sin, 556
Augustine, St., his contest with Pelagius, 557
Augustine, St., on penitence, 561
Augustine, St., on prayers for the dead, 586, n.
Augustine, St., on preaching, 587
Augustine, St., on purgatory, 600
Augustine, St., and the Athanasian Creed, 610
Augustine, St., on Genesis, 631, n.
Augustine, St., on renovation, 637
Augustine, St., on re-ordination, 638
Augustine, St., on the Resurrection Body, 650, n., 651, n., 652, n.
Augustine, St., on Sacraments, 669
Augustine, St., on Sponsors, 715
Augustine, St., on Hypostatic Union, 774, n.
Augustine, St., on unity of the Church, 777
Augustine, St., on universal redemption, 102, n., 777, n., 779, n.
Augustine, St., on punishments of sin, 808
Augustinianism and Calvinism, 103
Augustinian doctrine, notions of Origen opposed to, 555
"Augustinus," Jansen's, 106, 361
Australian Church, the, 485
Auxerre, Council of, 272
Avesta, its resemblance to the Cabbala, 98

Baal, in New Testament, 73
Bacon, on angels, 22, n.
Bacon, on Atheism, 56
Bacon, on eternity, 22, n.
Bacon, on evil, 263, n.
Bacon, on the Jesuits, 370
Bacon, on Libertinism, 57
Bacon, on Church controversies, 605
Bacon, on Divine existence, 741
Bacon, on divisions in the Church, 565
Bacon, on the Law of Christ, 404
Bacon, on persecution, 564
Bacon, on Puritanism. 606, 607
Bacon, on the Sabbath, 667
Bacon, Roger, theology of, 750
Baius, account of, 106
Baius, and Pius V., 342, n.
Balaam, followers of, 512
Baptism, the, administered by Christ, 76
Baptism and election, 232
Baptism, form of, 77
Baptism, grace of, 78
Baptism, grace given in, 299
Baptism of Infants, 343
Baptism, illumination the result of, 324
Baptism in New Testament, 74
Baptism, its necessity to salvation, 77
Baptism, justification bestowed in, 385
Baptism, Lay, 404
Baptism, Lay, validity of, 405
Baptism, matter of, 74
Baptism, minister of, 77
Baptism, not to be repeated, 624
Baptism, Trine, 763
Baptism, Vernacular Office for, 764
Baptismal Lights, 413
Bari, Council of, 286
Baronius, on Simony, 700
Barnabas, epistle of, 278
Barrow, on the Jews, 376
Barter, on Apostolical succession, 40
Basil, St., account of, 282
Basil, St., Coptic liturgy of, 391, n.
Basil, St., and Hypostasis, 320
Basil, St., on Cenobitism, 119
Basil, St., on compline, 315
Basil, St., liturgy of, on Diptychs, 203
Basil, St., on indulgences, 341
Basil, St., on the origin of ritual, 656
Basil, St., on οὐσία, 532
Basil, St., on the resurrection of the body, 651

Basil, St., on subdeacons, 716
Basil, St., on Antitype, 34
Basilides, on Sephiroth, 100
Basilides, on the Nature of God, 532
Basle, Council of, and Immaculate Conception, 329
Baxter and Calvin, 104
Beatification and Canonization, 80
Bechai, Rabbi, on Shechinah, 697
Bede, on the Culdees, 179
Beelzebub, 73
Beelzebub, a name of Satan, 676
Beghards and Lollards, 428
Belial, a name of Satan, 676
Belief, states of, which exclude doubt, 216
Bellarmine, on celibacy of the Clergy, 117
Bellarmine, on purgatory, 599, 601, n.
Bellarmine and Ultramontanism, 770
Benedict, St., and his rule, 489
Benedict, St., on compline, 315
Benedicite, hymn, 358
Benediction, office of, 82
Benediction, in Old Testament, 81
Benedictines, 493
Benefices, reservation of, 643
Berkeley and matter, 455
Bernard, St., on Immaculate Conception, 329
Bernard, St., on sanctity of the Blessed Virgin, 330
Bernard, St., on the Trinity, 138
Bernard, St., and scholastic theology, 747
Bethell, Bp., on regeneration, 630
Bethlehem, Council of, and transubstantiation, 760
Beveridge, on Apostolical canons, 112
Bibliotheca Divina, 84
Bingham, on early use of word parish, 541
Bingham, on indulgences, 341
Bingham, on infant baptism, 344
Bishops, election of, 87
Bishops, English, jurisdiction of, 384
Bishops, English, succession of the, 383, n.
Bishops ordained by Apostles, 85
Blackstone, on parish, 541
Blackstone, on parson, 542
Blasphemy, different classes of, 88
Blood and atonement, 66
Blood, connection of soul with, 89
Blood, sacred character of, 89
Blunt, Charles, his works on Deism, 191
Blunt, Prof., on Apostolical Constitutions, 149
Blunt, J. H., on English liturgy, 424
Blunt, J. H., on papal supremacy, 722
Blunt, J. H., on sacraments, 670
Body, creation of the, 90
Body, influence of the Fall on, 90
Body, new creation of the, 509
Body, resurrection of the, 649
Böhm, Jacob, account of, 752
Bolingbroke, Lord, and Deism, 196
Bologna, concordat of, 139
Bona, Cardinal, on concomitance, 139, n.
Bona, on readers, 622
Boundaries, parish, 542
Braga, second council of, 272
Brahminism, a form of Pantheism, 538
Bramhall, Abp., on dispensation, 206
Bramhall, on external communion, 681
Bramhall, on monasteries, 519
Bread used for Holy Communion, 799
Briefs, in England, 15
Brooke, Lord, on mammon, 439
Browne, Bp., on Opus operatum, 525
Brown, on Divine existence, 742
Buddha, life and doctrine of, 92
Buddhism and Christianity, 93
Bull, Bishop, on circumcision, 130
Bull, Bp., on guardian angels, 299
Bull, Bp., on imputed righteousness, 333, n.
Bull, on invocation of saints, 358
Bull, on Monarchia, 486
Bulteel, on imputed righteousness, 333
Burke on Church and State, 756
Burton, Dr., on Simon Magus, 30, n.
Butler, Bp., on miracles, 474, n.
Butler, Bp., on natural religion, 630
Butler, Bp., on heathen sacrifices, 680

Cabbalists and Talmud, 377
Cabbala, Babylonish growth of the, 96
Cabbala on Shechinah, 698
Cæsarius, St., of Arles, on rogation days, 661
Cæsarius, St., of Arles, on Extreme Unction, 772
Cain, sacrifice of, 679
Calendar, English, festivals of, 285
Calixtus, George, and Syncretism, 725
Calvin and universal redemption, 777
Calvinism condemned by Eastern Church, 105
Calvinism, history of, 104
Calvin, on predestination, 102
Calvin, on the real presence, 623
Calvin, on reprobation, 102, n.
Calvin, on sacramental grace, 103, n.
Calvinism, resulting in Antinomianism, 31
Cambridge, Latitudinarian school of, 396
Canons, Apostolic, antiquity of the, 398
Canons, Eusebian, 13
Canonical Hours, 315
Canon Law in the Church of Rome, 398
Canon Law, the, 401
Canon in New Testament, 107
Canons on the use of immersion, 75, n.
Canterbury, Archb. of, the sacerdotal head of the English Church, 551
Canterbury, monastery founded by St. Augustine at, 492
Cappel, on Atheism, 63
Carthage, councils of, 158, 159
Carthage, 3d council of, on Agapæ, 10
Casaubon, on doubt, 219
Casaubon, on experimental science, 59
Casaubon, on sorcery, 58
Cases, reserved, 645
Cassian, and predestination, 105, n.
Cassian, and Semi-Pelagianism, 692
Casual synods, 726
Catalogue of Popes, 571
Cataphrygians, 495
Catechetical use of creed, 170
Catechism, Assembly's, 107
Catechumenorum, Missa, 477
Cathari, the, on the use of water in baptism, 74, n.
Catholic, Roman perversion of term, 116
Cealchythe, council of, and Scottish priests, 179
Celebration, Eucharistic, Apostolic form of, 255
Celibacy, 795
Cenobite life, advantages of, 119
Censures, ecclesiastical, 513
Ceremonies, enjoined on Neophytes, 507
Ceremonies of marriage, 445
Ceylon, Buddhism in, 93
Chalcedon, council of, 164
Chastity, 165
Chaucer, on cursing for tithes, 21
Chemoth identified with Baal, 73
Cherubim, 23
Chiliasts, 471
Choral service, 657
Chrysippus the Stoic on Fatalism, 275
Christ, absolutions by, 3
Christ and Asceticism, 51
Christ, as man unfallen, 338
Christ, blood of, 89, 90
Christ's coming, the manner of, 686
Christ, death of, 186
Christ, Divinity of, 206
Christ's Divinity the key-stone of Christianity, 213
Christ, His suffering death not in accordance with human nature, 547
Christ, "ignorance" of, 322
Christ, indwelling of, 711, n.
Christ, intercession of, 351
Christ, intercession of, in Heaven, 352
Christ, "in the name of," 504
Christ, law of, 403
Christ's mediation, glory of the Saints in Heaven derived from, 462
Christ, nativity of, 505
Christ, object of the presence of, 461
Christ, Passion of, 547
Christ, pre-existence of, 589
Christ, presence of, 590
Christ, resurrection of, 646
Christ, resurrection of, a triumph over death, 648
Christ, sacrifice of, 680
Christ, session of, 695
Christ, the brethren of, 563
Christ, the "first-born" Son of Mary, 562
Christ bearing God's wrath, 809
Christ, the office of priesthood delegated to others by, 590
Christ the second Adam, 459
Christ, union of the soul with, 713
Christianity, aspect of Neo-Platonism towards, 507
Christianity, Pagan philosophy and, 535
Christianity, popular paganism and, 535
Christianity, the Pagan state and, 534
Christian Church, law of restitution in, 645
Christian Church, Pentecost in, 561
Christian ritual, special objects of, 654
Christians, persecution of, by Pagans, 536
Christian year, division of, 284
Christology, of Old Testament, 123
Christology, Socinian, 704
Chrysostom, St., account of, 282
Chrysostom, St., and Alms, 15
Chrysostom, St., on name "Christian," 121
Chrysostom, St., and fasting in Lent, 408
Chrysostom, St., and Gloria in Excelsis, 291
Chrysostom, St., and Practice of Intinction, 355
Chrysostom, St., and Star of Bethlehem, 242
Chrysostom, St., and the word Bible, 84
Chrysostom, St., on Agapæ, 10
Chrysostom, St., on Agapetæ, 10
Chrysostom, St., on Anaphora, 255
Chrysostom, St., on Anathema, 19
Chrysostom, St., on Antichrist, 28
Chrysostom, St., on Antitype, 33, n.

Chrysostom, St., on Apostolic Liturgy, 419
Chrysostom, St., on Authority of the Church, 71
Chrysostom, St., on Benedicite, 81
Chrysostom, St., on Bigamy, 84
Chrysostom, St., on Christmas, 122
Chrysostom, St., on Confirmation by Priests, 86, n.
Chrysostom, St., on Consecration of the Holy Eucharist, 358, n.
Chrysostom, St., on ἐγκρατῆ, 117, n.
Chrysostom, St., on Eucharistic Sacrifice, 254
Chrysostom, St., on Everlasting Punishment, 260
Chrysostom, St., on Fasting before Communion, 272
Chrysostom, St., on Fast days, 274
Chrysostom on God's wrath, 808
Chrysostom, St., on Hermits, 311
Chrysostom, St., on "Incomprehensible," 339
Chrysostom, St., on Kiss of Peace, 391
Chrysostom, St., on Mystical Body, 90
Chrysostom, St., on Prayers for the Dead, 586
Chrysostom, St., on the Pre-existence of Matter, 590
Chrysostom, St., on Purgatory, 602, n.
Chrysostom, St., on the Reading of Lessons, 409
Chrysostom, St., on the Septuagint, 785
Chrysostom, St., on term Faithful, 268
Chrysostom, St., on Tithes, 755, n.
Chrysostom, St., on Vernacular, 783
Chrysostom, St., on the Unity of the Church, 766
Chubb, T., works of, on Deism, 195
Church, the, and the State, 564
Church, the, cannot enforce Temporal Penalties, 564
Church, the, Modern missions of, 482
Church, the, associated with Christ in the work of Intercession, 352
Church, Authority of the, 71
Church, differences in the, concerning the celebration of Easter, 543
Church, etymology of, 128
Church, evils of seclusion in, 185
Church, Infallibility of the, 340
Church, Methodism a movement in, 465
Church Militant and Church Triumphant, 511
Church, ministerial offices of, derived from Apostles, 36
Church, nature of the, 129
Church, New Creation relative to the, 510
Church, notes of the, 516
Church, testimony of the, on Polygamy, 569
Church, voice of Christ in the, 462
Church, Ancient, preaching in, 587
Church, African, on heretical baptism, 160
Church, Early, Hymns of, 318
Church, early missions of, 480
Church, Eastern, Deaconesses in, 186
Church, Eastern, on Procession of the Holy Ghost, 594
Church, English, on Confession, 142
Church, English, on Eternal Punishment, 182
Church, English, on Eucharistic Lights, 414
Church, English, and Everlasting Punishment, 260, n.
Church, English, on Forbidden Degrees, 189
Church, English, and Exorcism, 266
Church, English, and Lavipedium, 398
Church, English, and Missa Sicca, 479
Church, English, on New Testament Canon, 109
Church, English, and Predestination, 235
Church, English, on re-ordination, 638
Church, English, on restitution, 646
Church, English, on unbaptized infants, 346
Church, Early, its teaching, on the resurrection of the Body, 651
Church, English, on Universal Redemption, 779
Church, English, use of the Vernacular in, 784
Church, English, on works, 807
Church, English, Prayer for the Dead recognised by, 586
Church, Irish, Missionary spirit of, 491
Church, Primitive, absence of Images in, 326
Church, Primitive, Asceticism in, 51
Church, Primitive, Enthusiasm in, 239
Church, Primitive, Ordination of Bishops in, 86
Church, Roman, on New Testament Canon, 109
Church, Roman, on re-ordination, 638
Church, Unity of the, 775
Cicero on the Sibylline Oracles, 698
Cicero, on conscience, 146
Cicero on Fatalism, 275
Civil contract of marriage, 443
Civil Law, 400
Civil Power, Dependence of Lutheranism on, 436
Clarendon, Articles of, 41
Clarendon, Constitutions of, 150
Clement, St., of Rome and γνῶσις, 294
Clement, St., of Rome, on Baptismal Grace, 78
Clement, St., of Rome, on clergy, 130
Clement, St., of Rome, on Election, 233
Clement, St., on Apostolic Succession, 798
Clement, St., Liturgy of, 391, n.
Clement, St., Recognitions of, 78
Clement, St., and Gloria Patri, 291
Clement, St., on Christ's Divinity, 209
Clement, St., on Eclecticism, 11
Clement, St., on Laity, 394
Clement, St., of Alexandria, account of, 12, 281
Clement of Alexandria and the Nicolaitans, 512
Clement, St., of Alexandria on Baptismal Grace, 79
Clement, St., of Alexandria on Canon of Scripture, 107, n.
Clement, St., of Alexandria, on Christmas, 122
Clement, St., of Alexandria, on clergy, 130
Clement, St., of Alexandria, on Mammon, 439
Clement, St., of Alexandria, on the Epistle of Barnabas, 278
Clement VI., on Indulgences, 341
Clementine Homilies and Recognitions, 78, 625
Clergy, Benefit of, 83
Clergy, Celibacy of the, 116
Clergy, vestments of the, 656
Clinic Baptism, 75
Cobham, Lord, account of, 431
Codex Alexandrinus, 13, 291
Codex Ambrosianus, 786
Codex Coislinianus, 786
Codex Cottonianus, 786
Codex Ephraim, 786
Codex Sinaiticus, marks of its antiquity, 702
Codex Vaticanus, 782
Cœlestius, opinions of, 555
Cœlestius, opinions of, on unbaptized infants, 559
Cœna Domini, 434
Co-operation, Lay, 406
"Cohortatio," 12
Collins, Anthony, works of, on Deism, 193
Collier, on Puritanism, 605
Columba, St., account of, 491
Columba, St., and Northern Christianity, 179
Commemoration, Annual, 26
Commission, High court of, 513
Common Law, English, 402
Communion, Fasting before, 272
Comparative criticism, 176
Competentes, and The Lord's Prayer, 433
Comte, Augustus, account of, 578
Conception, Immaculate, 328
Confession, an element of Repentance, 640
Confession, Augsburg, 68
Confession, Augsburg, and Thirty-nine Articles, 70
Confession, Auricular, 70, 205
Confessions, Calvinistic, 107
Confessions, Calvinistic, on Election, 235, n.
Confession, Mediæval system of, 142
Confession, object of, 141
Confession, spiritual value of, 142
Confirmation, administered by priests, 86, n.
Confirmation, called "chrism," 121
Conscience, the gift of God, 146
Consciousness of doubt, 219
Consecrations by deprived bishops, 515
Consecration of Nuns, 519
Consolator, a meaning of Paraclete, 540
Constantine Copronymus and Iconoclasts, 321
Constantinople, Council of, anathemas of, 21
Constantinople, Council of, 163
Constantine, Labarum of, 393
Constantine the originator of Paulicianism, 552
Constitutions, Clementine, 400
Contract, natural, of Marriage, 442
Controversy, Paschal, 543
Conventicle Act, Charles II., 513
Convention, Archiepiscopal, 154
Convocation, and the Reformation, 156, 157
Convocation, rights of the Lower House of, 155
Corban, oblation referring to, 521
Corpus Juris Canonici, 399
Cosin, Bishop, on Puritan burial, 95
Cosmogony of the Cabbala, 99
Councils on Simony, 700
Courts, Synodal, 205
Cousin on Doubt, 218

Creation, Matter as relating to, 456
Creation, New, 507
Creation, proper sense of, 589, n.
Creator Spirit, definition of, 742
Creation, theories of, 168
Creation, work of the Son of God in, 168
Creed, Athanasian, origin of, 609
Creeds, Liturgical character of, 171
Creed, Nicene, 167
Creed, Nicene, its acceptance by the churches, 512
Creeds, statement of, on Christ's divinity, 207
Creeds, traces of, in Scripture, 169, 170
Crisp, Dr., on Imputed Righteousness, 332
Crœsus, on a future state, 538
Cross, form of, 176
Cross, symbolic use of, 178
Cross, types of, 177
Crown, eccelesiastical jurisdiction of, 380
Crusades, the offspring of enthusiasm, 269
Cursive MSS., 176, n.
Cyprian, St., account of, 281
Cyprian, St., commentary of, on The Lord's Prayer, 433
Cyprian, St., Encyclical of, 239
Cyprian, St., on Bishops, 85
Cyprian, St., on burial, 94, n.
Cyprian, St., on clinic baptism, 132
Cyprian, St., on choice of bishops, 87
Cyprian, St., on Confirmation, 144
Cyprian, St., on Councils, 159, n.
Cyprian, St., on election of Bishops, 87, n.
Cyprian, St., on Episcopacy, 242
Cyprian, St., on Eucharist, 248, n.
Cyprian, St., on the Evangelists, 297
Cyprian, St., on laity, 394
Cyprian, St., on marriage, 446
Cyprian, St., on ordination of penitents, 204
Cyprian, St., on Re-baptism, 624
Cyprian, St., on Sacraments, 668
Cyprian, St., on Sursum Corda, 723
Cyprian, St., on the "breath of life," 459
Cyprian, St., on virginity, 796
Cyprian, St., ou Unity of the Church, 776
Cyril, St., of Alexandria, account of, 283
Cyril, St., of Alexandria, on Union Hypostatic, 774
Cyril, St., of Alexandria, on Eucharist, 247, n.
Cyril of Alexandria and Nestorius, 164
Cyril, St., anathemas of, 21
Cyril, St., Confession of Faith, 105
Cyril, St., and Anthropomorphism, 27
Cyril, St., on Candlemas, 107
Cyril, St., on Adoptionism, 6
Cyril, St., on Baptismal grace, 78, n.
Cyril, St., on Liturgic intercessions, 427
Cyril, St., on Sursum Corda, 723
Cyril, St., on trine immersion, 76
Cyril, St., of Jerusalem, account of, 282
Cyril, St., of Jerusalem, on Antichrist, 29
Cyril, St., of Jerusalem, ou Catechumens, 115
Cyril, St., of Jerusalem, on Confirmation, 144
Cyril, St., of Jerusalem, on Eucharistic sacrifice, 254
Cyril, St., of Jerusalem, on Eucharistic types, 248, n.
Cyril, St., of Jerusalem, on Immersion, 75

Damascene, St. John, on Antitypc, 34
Damascene, St. John, on Theandric operation, 737
Damascene, St. John, on Trisagion, 766, n.
Damasus, on the Divinity of The Holy Ghost, 437
Damian, Peter, on Transubstantiation, 759
Daniel, on Episcopacy, 605, n.
Daniel, prophetic weeks of, 801
Day, Lord's, 432
Deaconess, duties of, 186
Dead, Burial of the, 94
Dead, Prayer for the, 585
De Civitate Dei, of St. Augustine, 283
Decline, intellectual, of the Church, 184
Decretals, the, 399
Degradation, form of, 188
Deism, relation of rationalism to, 616
Demoniacal Possession, 198
Descartes, dualism of, 224
Descartes, on Divine Existence, 739
Descartes, on doubt, 217
Desire and Volition, Heart the source of, 302
Deutero-Canonical books, 109
D'Holbach's Système de la Nature, 59, 64
Διαβολος, a name of Satan, 675
Diaconate, founded by the Apostles, 185
Dialectical Mystics, 501
Diatessaron, difficulty of constructing a, 202
Dies iræ, on the Sibylline Oracles, 698
Diet of Augsburg, 68, 69
Diocesan synods, 726
Dioceses, English, origin of, 203
Diodorus Sic. on Tithes, 755, n.
Diognetus, epistle to, 280
Diogenes Laertius, and the Magian ideas of God, 538
Dionysius of Alexandria and the Nicene Creed, 511
Dionysius, of Alexandria, account of, 281
Dionysius, on οὐσία, 532
Dionysius on Theophany, 751
Diptychs, 101
Disciplina Arcani, 171
Disciplina Arcani, Economy allied to, 230
Dispensation, old, mediators under, 459
Dispensation, three kinds of, 206
Divine Existence, physico-theological proof of, 740
Divine injunctions to Prayer, 583
Divine Nature, 505
Divine operations in man, Heart the subject of, 303
Divine Service, modes of celebrating, 657
Divines, Westminster Assembly of, on Puritanism, 604
Divinity of the Holy Ghost, 714
Doctrine, Catholic, test of, 116
Dogmatic Theology, 745
Döllinger, on the Jewish origin of Millennium, 471
Dominicans, enthusiasm of the, 240
Donatists, 85, 160
Dorner, on Mysticism, 501
Dort, Synod of, 48, 106, 107,
Doubt, History of, 218
Doubt, Origin of, 217
Doxology, Little, 291
Dragon, a name of Satan, 676
Drouven, on forms used in ordination, 88, n.
Druidism, transmigration of souls in, 465
Dualism, Buddhist, 457
Dualism, causes of, 225
Dualism, difficulties of, 226
Dualism, Gnostic systems and, 458
Dualism, history of, 220
Dualism, Manichæan, 457
Durandus on Sacramentals, 668
Durandus ou Trinity Sunday, 765
Dualism, Platonic, 458
Dualistic theory of evil, 675
Durandus, on Easter, 227
Durandus, on Lavipedium, 398, n.
Dyer, on Calvinism, 105
Dynamical theory of Inspiration, 349

Early Christians and Millennium, 471
Early varieties of ritual custom, 660
Easter, Annotine, 25
Easter, difficulty of fixing the day, 545
Easter typified in the Jewish law, 228
Eastern Bishops on Purgatory, 602, n.
Eastern Church and celibacy, 118
Eastern Church and Rogation-tide, 661
Eastern Church, Christology of, 124
Eastern Church and Concomitance, 139 n.
Eastern Church, its form of Baptism, 77
Eastern mind, type of the, 554
Ecclesiastical censures, 513
Ecclesiastical discipline, 204
Ecclesiastical fasting, 273
Ecclesiastical foundations, 289
Ecclesiastical jurisdiction, 380
Ecclesiastical law, 400
Ecclesiastical privileges, early, 132
Ecclesiasticus, on Old Testament Canon, 108
Eclectic School, 11
Eclecticism, 293
Economy, a name of Incarnation, 4
Economy of Grace, position of Sacraments in the, 670
Ectene, 84
Edgar, King, law of, on parishes, 542
Edmund, King, laws of, on marriage, 444
Egypt, Pantheism in, 538
Elect, the, and grace of God, 298
Elijah, as connected with the Second Advent, 685
Elipand of Toledo and Adoptionism, 6
Ellicott, Bishop, on Inspiration, 350, n.
Ellicott, Bishop, on everlasting punishment, 259, n.
Elvira, Council of, 160
Ember Days, the, 274
Ember, etymology of, 370
Empire, Roman, and Dark Ages, 182
England, convents founded in, 491
England, influence of Mysticism in, 502
English Church Calendar, 101
English Church, image worship in, 327
English Church, missions of, 483
English Litany, Invocation of Saints in, 417
English Liturgy, oblation in, 522
Enoch, Book of, on everlasting punishment, 258
Enthusiasm and Atheism, 58
Enthusiasm and fanaticism, 268

Ephesus, Council of, 164
Ephesus, Liturgy of 423
Ephraem Rescript, 786
Epictetus, on conscience, 146
Epicureans and Atheists, 57
Epiphanius, St., on celibacy of the clergy, 118
Epiphanius, on Friday fasting, 274
Epiphanius, on Procession of the Holy Ghost, 594, n.
Epiphanius, on Rogations, 661, n.
Epiphanius and Cerinthus, 120
Epiphanius, on Arianism, 32
Epiphanius, on Assumption of Blessed Virgin, 55
Epiphanius, on Cathari, 116
Epiphanius, on the observance of Holy Week, 543
Epiphanius, on Mishna, 477
Epiphany and Nativity, joint celebration of, 123
Episcopal order, division of, 86
Episcopacy, growth of the true doctrine of, 606
Episcopate, distinct from presbyterate, 85
Episcopate, distinct from the priesthood, 526
ὁ ἐρχόμενος, a name of Christ, 1
Erigena, J. Scotus, work of, on Pantheism, 538
Erskine, Cardinal, on Bull "In Cœna Domini," 133
"Erudition for any Christian Man," on extreme unction, 772
Esponsals, ceremonies of, 445
Estius, on Apostolical succession, 38, n.
Eternal death, 186
Eternal decrees, 187
Eternity, Lord Bacon on, 22, n.
Ethiopic version, 789
Eucharist, ablutions in, 2
Eucharist and Altar, 16
Eucharist, form of, 249
Eucharist, grace of, 249
Eucharist, invocation of Holy Spirit in, 357
Eucharist, litany connected with the, 417
Eucharist, matter of, 248
Eucharistic elements, Antitype, a name of, 34
Eucharistic lights, 414
Eucharistic sacrifice, prayer for the dead connected with, 586
Eucherius, St., of Lyons, on interpretation, 355, n.
Eunomeans, 44
Eusebian canons, 110
Eusebius, account of, 281
Eusebius, canons of, 110
Eusebius, on angels, 23
Eusebius, on Apostolical succession, 39, n.
Eusebius, on early councils, 159
Eusebius, on kneeling, 391
Eusebius, on Monarchianism, 487
Eusebius, on New Testament canon, 109, n.
Eusebius, on the Nicene Creed, 511
Eusebius, on the order of the gospels, 296
Eusebius, on the origin of Millenarianism, 471
Eusebius, on Papias, 280
Eusebius, on term Faithful, 267
Eutyches, heresy of, 164
Eutychians, 310, 494
Evangelicals, their original simplicity of life, 53
Evens, or vigils, fasting on, 275
Evil, origin of, 262
Excommunication, form of, 265
Excommunication, old form of, 20, n.
Existence, Divine, ontological proofs of, 738
Exorcists, 131, 200
Exoreists, order of, 527
Exposition of the Mass, 454
Extreme unction, history of the rite, 771
Extraordinary mission, 480
Ezra, Aben, on processional use of Hallel, 301
Ezra, and Talmudism, 728

Faber, on justification, as taught by the Fathers, 384, n.
Faith, analogy of, 18
Faith, articles of, 49
Faith, confession of, 141
Faith, implicit, 331
Faith, objective, 521
Faith, relation of doubt to, 220
Faith, rule of, 663
Faith, subjective, 521
Fall, loss of beauty consequent on the, 91
False decretals, 187
Fasting, exemptions from, 271
Fasting, objections to the practice, 270
Fatalism, not found in the Bible, 276
Fathers and choral services, 657
Fathers, on Advent, 7
Fathers, on Apostolical Canons, 112
Fathers, on celibacy of the Clergy, 117
Fathers, on concomitance, 139
Fathers, on deaconesses, 185
Fathers, on good works, 387, n.
Fathers, on justification, 384, n.
Fathers, on New Testament Canon, 109
Fathers, on Old Testament types of baptism, 74, n.
Fathers, and prayers for the dead, 599
Fathers, on punishment of the wicked, 181
Fathers, on reservation, 641
Fathers, on the Sibyl, 699
Fathers, on the Spirit as a title of Christ, 711
Fathers, on Transubstantiation, 761
Feasts, moveable, 285
Feeling and reason, 8
Feeling and the feelings, 8
Fees, burial, 94
Felix of Urgel and Adoptionism, 6
Ferrara, Council of, 287
Festival lights, 414
Fidelium, Missa, 477
Fiduciaries, 704
Finite, relation of the Infinite to, 347
Firmilian, on early synods, 158, n.
Five Articles, the, 48
First-fruits and Annates, 25
Flacianists, 5
Flagellantes, 268
Fleury, on Ultramontanism, 770
Font, blessing of, 82
Forbes, Bishop, on Protestantism, 596
Forbidden degrees, 189
Form of baptism, 76
Fossarii, 131
Fox, George, account of, 608
Franciscans, enthusiasm of the, 240
Frankel, on Haggadah, 300
Frankfort, Council of, 6
Freeman, on canonical hours, 315
Freeman, on elevation, 236
Freeman, on Intercession of Christ, 352
Freeman, on offertory, 522
Freeman, on the connection of hallelujah with oblation, 523
Freeman, on Kyrie Eleëson, 392
Freeman, on Trisagion, 766
Free-will, infinity in, 347
Fridays, fasting on, 274
Friuli, Council of, 6, 286
Fulgentius, on fatalism, 276
Funeral lights, 414

Galileo, and the Jesuits, 371
Gall, St., Tripartite rite of, 17
Gallican Church, Pragmatic Sanction in, 580
Gallican Liberties, the, 581
Gallican Liturgies, 423
Gallican Psalter, 790
Gassendi, on Atheism, 57
Γεέννα, translated "Hell," 305
Gelasius, Sacramentary of, and baptismal lights, 413
Gemara, account of the, 729
General Synods, 726
Generation, Eternal, 243
Gentilly, council of, 286
Gentile Church, Hellenists the centre of, 306
German and Norse Dualism, 220
German codes, on crime, 184
Germany, English and Irish missions to, 481
German Pantheism, 539
Germany, Rationalism in, 618
Gieseler, on the Clementine Homilies, 625
Gieseler, on Montanism, 79
Gieseler, on the origin of the Gospels, 502
Gieseler, on Universal Redemption, 777
Glory, spiritual meaning of, 292
Gnostics, doctrines of the, 294
Gnostics, on creation, 174
Gnosticism, and the Cabbala, 96
Gnosticism, the foundation of all heresy, 308
God, Heaven the abode of, 303
God, indwelling of, 711, n.
God, mother of, 497
God, the gradual revelation of, to the world, 644
God, the origin of life, 410
God, Scripture statements on the Incarnation of, 334
God, wrath of, 808
Good works, 805
Goodness, a Divine quality, 325
Good works indispensable to justification, 386
Gospel, the, 736
Gospel Lights, 413
Gothico-Gallican missal on purgatory, 601, n.
Grace, actual, 5
Grace at Clifford's Inn, 82, n.
Grace, indefectible, 341
Grace, means of, 458
Greater Excommunication, 264
Greater Sanhedrin, 673
Greece, Pantheism in, 538
Gregory of Nazianzum on conscience, 147, n.
Gregory of Nazianzum on Theophany, 750
Gregory, St., account of, 490
Gregory, St., Antiphonarium of, 32
Gregory, St., hymns of, 282, 318, n.
Gregory, St., sacramentary of, and baptismal lights, 413
Gregory, St., and Alleluia, 14
Gregory, St., and British bishops, 162, n.

Gregory, St., and Lent, 274
Gregory, St., and reservation of benefices, 643
Gregory, St., on burial fees, 94, n.
Gregory, St., on mode of celebrating Eucharist, 656
Gregory, St., on re-ordination, 637
Gregory, St., on use of pictures in churches, 327
Gregory, St., of Tours, on Rogation days, 274
Grote, on Scripture criticism, 175, n.
Grotianism, 397
Grotius, and the Lord's Prayer, 332
Guardian angels, 24
Guéranger, on Apostolic Liturgy, 419
Guerinets, 323
Guyon, Madame, Quietism of, 613

Habitual jurisdiction, 381
Hades of Roman Theology, 201
Hades personified by Abaddon, 2
Haggadol, Hallel, 301
Hales, on Latitudinarianism, 396
Hallam, on English Arminianism, 48
Hallam, on Papal authority, 371
Hallam, on Pascal's letters, 363
Hallam, on the Pallium, 721
Hands, Imposition of, 331
Harvey, on Apollinarian heresy, 610
Harvey, on our Lord's resurrection, 647
Health, effects of fasting on, 271
Heart, Shechinah of God's presence in, 697
Heathen, salvation of the, 495
Heathenism, evil of, 264
Heaven, situation of, 305
Hefele, on Apostolical canons, 112
Hegel, on the Divine existence, 533
Hegel, Pantheism of, 743
Hegel, on Sephiroth, 100
Hell, descent into, 201
Henry VIII., statute of, on dispensations, 206
Herbert, George, on casuistry, 115
Herbert, Lord, of Cherbury, 191
Heretics, Christian, dualism of, 223
Heretics, opinions of, on the body of Christ, 337
Hermas, Shepherd of, 280
Herrnhuters, the, 495
Herodotus, and the Persian ideas of God, 538
Hervey, on imputed righteousness, 331
Heylin, on Arminius, 46, n.
Heylin, on the Augsburg Confession, 106
Hickes, on oblations in the Eucharist, 253, n.
Hilary, St., account of, 282
Hilary, St., on Adoptionism, 6
Hilary, St., on Antichrist, 28
Hilary, St., on Episcopacy, 242
Hilary, St., on Novatianism, 518, n.
Hilary, St., on original sin, 556
Hilary, St., on purgatory, 599, n.
Hilary, St., on the sacrifice of Christians, 657
Hilary, St., and the Athanasian Creed, 610
Hilda, St., account of, 492
Hillel, sayings of, 314
Hindustan, Buddhism in, 93
Hippolytus, on γνῶσις, 294, n.
Hippolytus, on economy, 229
Hobbes and Deism, 191
Holy Eucharist, sacrifices a type of, 671
Holy Ghost, blaspheming against, 88
Holy Ghost, procession of the, 592
Holy Ghost, the, 713
Holy Ghost, indwelling of, 711, n.
Holy Ghost, office of, 714
Holy Orders, 526
Holy Water, blessing of, 82
Hooker, on appetite, 8
Hooker, on Burial Service, 95
Hooker, on Confession, 640
Hooker, on Contrition, 351
Hooker, on the Fall of Angels, 22
Hooker, on Grace, 297
Hooker, on Grace and Labour, 298
Hooker, on God's wrath, 808
Hooker, on Jewish and early Christian confession, 141
Hooker, on Justification, 387, n.
Hooker, on the necessity of mediation, 460
Hooker, on power of the keys, 390
Hooker, on Repentance, 640
Hooker, on Schism, 682
Hooker, on the Trinity in Unity, 320
Hooker, on Ubiquity, 770
Hooker, on Hypostatic Union, 774
Hormisdas, on Apostolical canons, 111
Host, carrying of the consecrated, 642
Human Nature, 506
Human Nature, renewal of, 637
Humanity, religion of, 579
Humbert, on Apostolical canons, 111
Hume's definition of miracles, 474
Hymns of the Church, on Christ's divinity, 208
Hypapante, a name for Candlemas, 107
Hypostatic Union, 774

Ἰχθύς, 251, n.
Ἰχθύς, Tertullian on, 79
Iconium, council of, 159
Ideology, 502
Ignatius, St., on Baptism, 77
Ignatius, St., on Christ's divinity, 209
Ignatius, St., on Clergy, 130
Ignatius, St., and Amen, 17
Ignatius, St., and Concomitance, 138
Ignatius, St., and γνῶσις, 294
Ignatius, St., on Election, 233
Ignatius, St., on Episcopacy, 85
Ignatius, St,, epistles of, 279
Ignatius, St., on Eucharistic sacrifice, 252
Ignatius, St., and Gnosticism, 31
Ignatius, St., on Marriage, 443
Ignatius, St., and Star of Bethlehem, 242
Ignatius, St., and Theophoroi, 752
Ignatius, St., on virginity, 796
Ignatius, St., on widows, 803
Illumination, apart from knowledge, 324
Illiberis, council of, 160
Imagination, Infinity as symbolized in, 348
"Immensus," 339
Impassibility, a Divine quality, 325
Impediments of marriage, 445
Imputed righteousness, 31, n.
Incarnation, Divine Nature relative to the, 506
Incarnation, purpose of, 338
Incarnation, results of, 337
Incarnation, Scripture language on, 336
Incarnation, session of Christ the complement of, 696
Incarnation, the Blessed Virgin the moral instrument of, 451
Incarnation, the Blessed Virgin's position in the economy of, 451
Indestructibility, a Divine quality, 325
India, early missions to, 481
India, work of the Church in, 485
India and Japan, Xavier's mission to, 482
Indicative Absolution, 4
Indefinite, the, 346
Indulgences, abuse of, 342
Indulgences, a name for Libelli Pacis, 410
Indulgences, sale of, 205
Innocent I., on Extreme Unction, 772
Innocent, St., on Paulianists, 552
Inspiration, Dynamical theory of, 236
Inspiration, revelation distinct from, 652
Institution gives cure of souls, 179
"Institution of a Christian Man," on Indulgences, 343
"Institution of a Christian Man," on Extreme Unction, 772
"Institution of a Christian Man," on Limbus, 416
"Institution of a Christian Man," on the Popedom, 596
"Institution of a Christian Man," on Sacraments, 669
Institution of Baptism, 76
Institutes of Calvin, 105
"Inter Beneficiatos," 139
Intercessory character of primitive Liturgies, 427
Interdict, Papal, 205
Intermediate state, Paradise associated with, 541
Interpretation, four kinds of, 355
Interpretation, literal, 417
Interpretation, metaphorical, 463
Invisible Church, the, 129
"Ipso facto" excommunication, 265
Irenæus, St., and succession of the Popes, 571
Irenæus, St., creed in, 14
Irenæus, St., account of, 281
Irenæus, St., and infant baptism, 344
Irenæus, St., and millennium, 472
Irenæus, St., on Antitype, 34
Irenæus, St., on Apostolical succession, 39, n.
Irenæus, St., on baptismal grace, 79
Irenæus, St., on bishops, 85
Irenæus, St., on canon of Scripture, 107, n.
Irenæus, St., on creation, 167
Irenæus, St., on faith, 18
Irenæus, St., on fasting in Lent, 407
Irenæus, St., on Gnostic baptisms, 77
Irenæus, St., on Incarnation, 333
Irenæus, St., on "ignorance" of Christ, 323
Irenæus, St., on "Incomprehensible," 339
Irenæus, St., on Prototype, 597
Irenæus, St., on the Apocalypse, 110
Irenæus, St., on Apostolical Succession, 85, n.
Irenæus, St., on the Blessed Virgin, 450, n.
Irenæus, St., his description of Cerinthus, 120
Irenæus, St., on the Evangelists, 297
Irenæus, St., on the Nicolaitans, 512
Irenæus, St., on the obedience of the Blessed Virgin, 452
Irenæus, St., on the observance of Easter, 543
Irenæus, St., on the rule of faith, 663
Irenæus, St., on the word orthodox, 532
Isidore, St., on Gospel lights, 413
Isidore of Seville, on penitence, 561
Islamism and Predestination, 277
Itala Version, 789

James, St., Liturgy of, 421
Jansen, his deductions from Augustine, 362
Jehovah, Name, antiquity of, 368
Jehovah, derivation of the Name, 364
Jehovah, origin of Name, 365
Jehovah, pronunciation of Name, 364
Jerome, St., account of, 283
Jerome, St., on Agapæ, 9
Jerome, St., on Agapetæ, 10
Jerome, St., and Allelnia, 14
Jerome, St., on Amen, 17, 17, n.
Jerome, St., on Antichrist, 28
Jerome, St., on Apostolic Liturgy, 419
Jerome, St., on authenticity, 71
Jerome, St., on Baal, 73
Jerome, St., on baptism, 77
Jerome, St., and the word Bible, 84
Jerome, St., on bishops, 85
Jerome, St., on bishops and presbyters, 86
Jerome, St., and the Cabbala, 97
Jerome, St., on canonization, 113
Jerome, St., and classical study, 184
Jerome, St., Comes of, 133, 107
Jerome, St., on confirmation by priests, 86, n.
Jerome, St., on clergy, 130
Jerome, St., on creationism, 169, n.
Jerome, St., on deacons, 185
Jerome, St., and Ebionites, 228
Jerome, St., on Episcopacy, 242
Jerome, St., on Eucharist, 248, n.
Jerome, St., on the Evangelists, 297
Jerome, St., on extinction of culture in the West, 183
Jerome, St., on heresy, 306
Jerome, St., on lay priesthood, 407
Jerome, St., on Lent, 408
Jerome, St., on the minister of baptism, 77, n.
Jerome, St., on Mishna, 477
Jerome, St., on the order of the Gospels, 296, n.
Jerome, St., on Parable, 539
Jerome, St., on Polycarp's epistle, 278
Jerome, St., on preaching, 588
Jerome, St., on presbyterian ordination, 86, n.
Jerome, St., on purgatory, 600
Jerome, St., on revelation, 652
Jerome, St., on Sephiroth, 99
Jerome, St., on the Septuagint, 786
Jerome, St., on sign of cross, 177
Jerome, St., on the use of lights, 413
Jerome, St., on transmigration, 464
Jerome, St., his Vulgate, 790
Jerusalem, bishops of, prerogatives appertaining to, 162, n.
Jerusalem, council of, 105
Jerusalem Talmud, on the observance of the Passover, 548
Jerusalem, Two Targums of, 733
Jesuits, constitution of order, 370
Jesuitism, dangers of, 371
Jesuits, enthusiasm of the, 240
Jesuits, learning the, 370
Jesuits, murders committed by, 372
Jesuits, missionary spirit of, 374
Jesuits, suppression of, 373
Jesus, baptizing in Name of, 77
Jesus, miraculous conception of, known to few, 335
Jews, fast days of the, 273
Jews, the, on baptism, 344 n.
Jewish Asceticism, 50
Jewish cavils on prophecies of Incarnation, 334
Jewish Church, prayers for the dead in the, 585
Jewish confession, 141
Jewish disabilities, removal of, 379
Jewish dispensation, polygamy under, 567
Jewish election of grace, 234, n.
Jewish form of benediction, 82
Jewish oblations, 521
Jewish origin of Millennium, 471
Jewish Pentecost, ceremonies of, 561
Jewish Sabbaths, 666
Jetsira, the, 96
Joma, on Sheehinah, 698
Jonathan, Targum of, 732
John Baptist, date of birth, 123
John, St., and the term ὁ Λόγος, 804
John, St., Liturgy of, 423
Johnson, on Apostolical Succession, 39
Josephus, on Old Testament Canon, 108
Josephus, on Sanhedrin, 673
Josephus, on transmigration, 649 n.
Judaism in Europe, 378
Judaism, its terminable character, 376
Judge of man, the same as his Mediator, 462
Judge ordinary, 527
Judgment, the last, 688
Julian, on the Redeemer's office, 555
Julius I., decree of, on Intinction, 355
Jurisdiction, Apostolic system of, 381
Jurisdiction, Hierarchy of, 312
Jurisdiction, patriarchal, 551
Jurisdiction, Sub-apostolic system of, 382
Justification, as taught by Luther, 435
Justification, formal cause of, 387, n.
Justinian, on Apostolic Canons, 112
Justinian, on Cenobites, 119
Justinian, law of, on sponsors, 715
Justinian, on Vernacular, 783
Justin Martyr, on Angels, 23
Justin Martyr, on Apostolic Liturgy, 420, n.
Justin Martyr, on baptismal grace, 79
Justin Martyr, on illumination, 324
Justin Martyr, on kiss of peace, 391
Justin Martyr, on Limbus, 415
Justin Martyr, on original sin, 528
Justin Martyr, on preaching, 587
Justin Martyr, on reading of lessons, 408
Justin Martyr, on the resurrection of the body, 651, n.
Justin Martyr, on revelation, 652
Justin Martyr, account of Eucharistic service, 255
Justin Martyr and Infant Baptism, 344
Justin Martyr and the Vernacular, 783
Justin Martyr, on Virginity, 796

Kant, on Divine existence, 739
Karaite observance of the Passover, 548
Karaite sect, 377
Karkuph Version, 788
Κατάληψις, 339
Kaye, Bishop, on οὐσία, 532, n.
Keble, on ceremonies, 439
Kherem, identical with anathema, 19
Kindred and affinity, table of, 9
Knowledge, a Divine quality, 325
Knox, on justification, 384, n.
Knox, A., on puritanism, 607
Knox, A., on superstition, 720
Koran, on Fatalism, 277
Krazer, on Apostolic Liturgy, 255, n.
Krazer, on the Holy Communion, 656

Labarum, origin of, 393
Lactantius, account of, 281
Lactantius, on sign of Cross, 177
Lactantius, on transmigration, 464
Lactantius, on white robes of Neophytes, 507, n.
Lactantius, and Millennium, 472
Laity, influence of, in England, 407
Lambeth Articles, 106
Laodicea, first council of, on Agapæ, 10
Laodicea, council of, 162
Lateran, 4th council of, on Transubstantiation, 760
Latimer, on canonization, 114
Latin creeds, 171
Latin Fathers, effects of legal training on, 554
Latitudinarians, 48, 256
Latria, 7
Latronum Synodus, 164
Laud, Archbishop, on condignity, 140
Laud and Arminianism, 48, n.
Laurence, Archbishop, on Book of Enoch, 258, n.
Laws of nature, 506
Law of simony, 701
Law respecting blasphemy, 89
Law, unwritten, the, 377
Law, Christian, respecting blood, 89
Law, English, on forbidden degrees, 189
Law, English, on heresy, 307
Laying on of hands necessary to ordination, 591
League, Schmalkaldic, 70
Lecky, on the Positivists, 579
Lecky, on rationalism, 615, n.
Lectores, 131
Legatine Synods, 153
Leibnitz, on the origin of evil, 674
Leighton, Archbishop, on doubt, 216
Leighton, and Evangelicalism, 257
Lent, consecration in, 642
Lent, in the Eastern Church, 274
Leo, St., account of, 283
Leo, St., on Christ's presence with his people, 461
Leo, St., on creationism, 169, n.
Leo, St., on Lent, 408
Lesser Excommunication, 265
Lesser Litany, 392
Lesser Sanhedrins, 673
Lessons, appointment of, 409
Le Vasser, on scepticism, 680
Levitical dispensation, use of lights in, 413
Libertinism and Atheism, 57
Liddon, on "ignorance" of Christ, 323
Liebermann, on Catholicity, 517
Life, blood the vehicle of, 89
Life, sacred character of, 410
Light and the Divine presence, 411
Lightfoot, on the Sanhedrin, 673
Light, ritual use of, 413
Liturgical use of the Lord's Prayer, 433
Liturgies, ancient, on elevation, 236
Liturgies, early, Eucharistic sacrifice in, 252, n.
Liturgies, early, on transubstantiation, 761
Liturgies, Greek, on Sacramental presence, 252, n.
Liturgies, literature of, 427
Liturgies, on Sacramental presence, 252
Liturgies, structure of, 424
Liturgy, Ambrosian, 17
Liturgy, Mozarabic, 497
Liturgy, origin of, 418
Locke, on person, 566
Locke, and Deism, 192
Locke, on the authenticity of Scripture, 617
Locke, on Divine revelation, 616
Locke, on the Holy Eucharist, 616

Logos, the, appearance of, to holy men of old, 751
Lollardism, 512
Lollardism, history of, 429
Lombard, Peter, on re-ordination, 638
Lombez, council of, and Albigenses, 11
Lopez, Gregory, Quietism of, 612
Lord, Our, His acts of mediation, 460
Lord, Our, the baptism of, 76, n.
Lord, Our, evidence of His resurrection, 646
Lord, Our, fitness of, by nature for the office of a mediator, 459
Lord, Our, His glory hidden in intercourse with men, 644
Lord, Our, perpetual presence of, with His church, 460
Lord, Our, prayers for the dead sanctioned by, 585
Lord, Our, representations of, lawful, 327
Lord, Our, union between and the Virgin Mary, 451
Loyola, Ignatius, account of, 370
Lucian, and adoration of Christ, 207, n.
Lucian, on the Lord's Prayer, 433
Lucian, the martyr, letter of, 410
Lucifer, a name of Satan, 676
Lucretius, on Fatalism, 275
Lull, Raimand, Theology of, 748
Luther, Antinomianism, result of his teaching, 30
Luther, on consubstantiation, 151
Luther, on confession, 436, 640
Luther, on justification, 387
Luther and Orders, 435
Luther and Ritual, 435
Luther and the Sacraments, 435
Lyndwood, on anathema, 20, n.
Lyndwood, on immersion, 75, n.
Lyons, council of, 287

Macaulay, on Pascal's letter, 363
Macaulay, on the Jesuits, 371
Maçon, Council of, 7
Maçon, Second Council of, 272
Macknight, on imputed righteousness, 332, n.
Maffei, on Apostolical Canons, 111
Magic, presumption against God, 437
Magic and Atheism, 58
Maimonides and Demiurge, 197
Maitland, on the fallen angels, 22, n.
Maimonides, on Haggadah, 300
Maimonides, on Hosanna, 314
Maimonides, on the Law, 377
Maitland, on the origin of Millenarianism, 472
Maldonatus, on procession of the Holy Ghost, 594, n.
Mamertus and Rogation Days, 661
Man, fall of, 268
Man, heart the internal state of, 302
Man, his need of an Intercessor, 351
Man, image of God in, 325
Man, new creation of his mental and spiritual faculties, 510
Manes, account of, 439
Manes, assumption of the name Paraclete by, 541
Manichees, 308
Manichees and almsgiving, 15
Manichean dualism, 223
Manning, on papal supremacy, 721
Mansel, on miracles, 475
Mansel, on sin, 701
Mansel, on the indefinite, 346
Marcion, account of, 440
Maréchal's Dictionnaire des Athées, 60, 65
Maréchal, on Atheism, 57
Mariana, on assassination, 371, n.
Maries, the four, 563
Mark, Bishop of Ephesus, on the Azymites, 289
Mark, St., Litany of, 417
Mark, St., Liturgy of, 422
Marriage, chief ceremonies of, 445
Marriage, impediments to, 445
Marriage, its indissoluble character declared by our Lord, 214
Martene, on Kyrie Eleëson, 392, n.
Martene, on Missa Sicca, 479, n.
Martensen, on purgatory, 603, n.
Martensen, on eternity, 247
Martyrs, term of saint applied to, 672
Martyr, Justin, account of, 281
Martyr, Justin, apology of, 35
Martyr, Justin, and alms, 15
Martyr, Justin, on Amen, 17
Martyr, Justin, on Christ's Divinity, 209
Martyr, Justin, on election, 233
Martyr, Justin, second apology of, 35
Martyr, Justin, on the term faithful, 268
Mason, on imputed righteousness, 332
Mass, ordinary of the, 527
Masses, different kinds of, 659
Massinger, on Atheism, 57
Materialism and Atheism, 60
Materialist views on the soul, 706
Mathematics and Atheism, 59
Matrimony, its essential part as a sacrament, 444
Matter, pre-existence of, 590
Matter, source of, 457
Maximus, on Theophany, 751
Mayence, Council of, 273
Mazarin Bible, 790
Mede, on the Jewish origin of Millennium, 471
Mediate mission, 480
Mediation, necessity for, 458
Mediæval Church and Dark Ages, 184
Mekkubbalim, 96
Melanchthon, on confession, 640
Melanchthon, on notes of the Church, 516
Melanchthon, on original sin, 531
Melanchthon, on predestination, 106, n.
Melanchthon, on repentance, 640
Meletian schism, 161, 463
Melito, apology of, 35
Melito and Anthropomorphism, 27, 27, n.
Menaion, 447
Mendelssohn, Moses, account of, 379
Menologion, 447
Metaphor compared with allegory, 14
Methodism and Asceticism, 53
Methodism, schismatical aspect of, 468
Methodius, on the Blessed Virgin, 452
Michael, Patriarch of Constantinople, on the Latins, 287
Micrologus, on "Ite, missa est," 454
Middleton, Dr., on miracles, 617
Milan, breviary of, 17
Mill, on the Captain of the Lord's host, 24, n.
Mill, on miracles, 475
Millenarians, 471
Milman, on image worship, 327
Milman, on Manichean martyrs, 449, n.
Milman, on Romanism, 662
Milman, on the "Tractatus" of Spinoza, 716, n.
Milner, on purgatory, 599, n.
Miltiades, apology of, 35
Milton, on Atheism, 57
Milton, on evil, 263
Milton, his primeval Christology, 123
Milton, on independent principle, 604
Milton, on Protestantism, 596
Milton, on Satan, 677
Minor orders, 526
Minister of baptism, 77
Ministration of angels, 25
Minucius Felix, Octavius of, 35
Miracles no violation of law, 719
"Mirror of Our Lady," on Ave Maria, 72
"Mirror of Our Lady," on The Lord's Supper, 434
Mishna, account of, 728
Mishna, growth of the, 476
Mishna, on Sanhedrin, 674
Mishna, translations of, 731
Mission conference, on polygamy, 569, n.
Mithra, mysteries of, and Eucharist, 254, n.
Mixed synods, 726
Molinos, Michael de, account of, 611
Molinos, teaching of, 612
Moloch identified with Baal, 73
Monasticism, benefits of, 489
Monasticism favourable to mysticism, 500
Monasticism, origin of, 487
Monasteries, government of, 518
Monasteries, nurseries of fanaticism, 268
Monica, on her burial, 95
Monotheism, origin and relation of Polytheism to, 570
Monophysites, 256, 494
Monophysite version of Scriptures, 788
Montalembert, on monks, 488
Montanists, 369
Montanists and Millenarianism, 473
Montanus, account of, 495
Moral Law, 403
Moravians, missionary spirit of, 496
More, Henry, on enthusiasm, 58
More, Sir T., on canonization, 114
Morinus, on forms used in ordination, 88, n.
Mormon, book of, 496
Mortal and venial sin, 701
Mosaic Law on forbidden degrees, 189
Mosaic Law on restitution, 645
Mosaic law of marriage, 449
Mosaic types of reconciliation, 628
Moses and Elias, appearance of, to our Lord, 759
Mouravieff, on Eastern rite of confirmation, 86, n.
Mozarabic Liturgy, kiss of peace in, 391
Mozarabic Missal, on purgatory, 601, n.
Mozley, on miracles, 474, n.
Myrk, on Ave Maria, 72
Myrk's instructions for parish priests, 49
Mystical body, 90
Mystics and feeling, 8
Mystics, dialectical, 501
Mythology, heathen and evil, 675, n.
"Mythic," as first applied to Scripture, 502

Nantes, edict of, 316
National Church, synod of, 152
National synods, 726
Natural body, 90
Natural morality, 495
Natural religion, 630
Natural religion, revealed religion the culmination of, 635

Nazarites, 51
Nazianzen, St. Greg., account of, 282
Nazianzen, Greg., on Easter, 227
Neale, on Eastern hours, 315
Neale, on Western mattins, 315
Neander, on infant baptism, 344, n.
Negative accommodation, 4
Newman, Dr., on the Trinity, 765, n.
Neocæsarea, council of, 161
Neo-Platonic school, 11
Nestorianism, 310
Nestorius, doctrines of, 507
Nestorius, heresy of, 163
New England, settlement in, 484
Newman, on Semi-Arianism, 691
New Testament, 736
New Testament use of word Church, 128
Newton, Sir I., on Divine existence, 740
Nicæ, Council of, 44, 158, 159, 160
Nirvâna, 92
Nisan, fourteenth, introductory character of, 545, n.
Noëtus, heretical opinions of, 552
Notarikon, the, 97
Novatians, 116
Novatian and Cornelius, 204
Novatians, doctrine of the, 517
Nuns, convents for, 488
Nyssen, St. Gregory, account of, 282
Nyssen, St. Gregory, on everlasting punishment, 259
Nyssen, St. Gregory, on the resurrection of the body, 651, n.

Oaths, lawfulness of, 520
Obedience, 166
Oblation, forms of the prayer of, 523
Ochinus, Bernard, account of, 703
Ockham, William of, account of, 750
Octavius of Minucius Felix, 35
Œcolampadius on the Divinity of Christ, 45, n.
Œcumenical Synods, 726
Odo, Abp., on tithes, 755, n.
Offerings at the altar, 522
"Offices," called "ceremonies," 120
Offices of burial, 95
Office, mediatorial, the manner of exercising it, 459
Official, office of an, 524
Oldcastle, Sir John, on the Eucharist, account of, 429, n., 431
Old English use of the word superstition in, 720
Old Testament, 737
Old Testament, choral service in, 657
Onkelos, Targum of, 732
Operations, intellectual, heart the seat of, 302
Operation, Theandric, 737
Ophite hymn, on γνῶσις, 294
Optative form of Absolution, 4
Optatus, on ΊΧΘΥΣ, 360
Oracles, Sibylline, 698
Oracles, Sibylline, Christian use of, 698
Oracles, Sibylline, successive versions of, 698
Order, hierarchy of, 312
Orders, minor, 406
Ordinaries, cases reserved to, 645
Ordinary mission, 480
Ordination, matter of, 87, 526
Ordination, power of, conferred by Our Lord, 480
Ordination, validity of, 88
Origen, account of, 281
Origen, on Antichrist, 29
Origen, on Christ's Divinity, 209
Origen, on Creationism, 168
Origen and Ebionites, 228
Origen, on everlasting punishment, 259, 259, n.
Origen, on evil, 674
Origen and "Idiotæ," 322
Origen and infant baptism, 345, n.
Origen, on interpretation, 355, n.
Origen, account of, 12
Origen, his belief in the transmigra- of souls, 464
Origen, his efforts to harmonize philosophy and Christianity, 527
Origen, on millennium, 472
Origen and the Septuagint, 786
Origen's Tetrapla, 786
Origeniani turpes, 527
Original Sin and Immaculate Conception, 331
Orleans, Council of, on Agapæ, 10
Orleans, First Council of, 274
Ormuzd, account of, 98
Ostiarii, 131
Our Lord, pastoral office of, 550
Overall, Bishop, on the descent into hell, 201, n.
Oxford, Council of, and Feast of Conception, 328, n.
Ozanam, on barbarian vices, 184

Pachomius, account of, 119
Paganism, decline of, 537
Paley, on Divine existence, 743
Palmer, on Latin baptisms by affusion, 75, n.
Palmer, on purgatory, 601
Παντελὴς ἀφορισμὸς, 34
Pantheism, history of, 537
Pantheism and Quietism, 613
Pantheistic theory of evil, 675
Papal supremacy, 720
Papal system of jurisdiction, 383
Papias, work of, 280
Paradise, spoken of by Our Lord, 541
Parker, Achbishop, his form of convocation, 155
Parson, requisites for becoming such, 542
Pascal, letters of, 363
Paschal controversy, 161
Paschal sacrifice, mode of celebration, 549
Paschal sacrifice, time of the, 548
"Passions lied" hymn, 319
Passive obedience, 514
Passover, confusion of the Jews as to the day of keeping it, 543
Pastor, its perverted sense, 798
Patriarchal system of jurisdiction, 383
Patrick, St., short account of, 490
Patrick, St., and Ireland, 481
Patrick, St., on Easter, 227
Patripassians, 210, 309
Paul, St., his Epistles a proof of Christianity, 502
Paul, St. Liturgy of, 423
Paul, St., Liturgy traced in the writings of, 419
Paul, St., trichotomy of, 706
Paul, St., and concomitance, 138
Paul, St., and St. James, apparent contradiction of, on justification, 388
Paul, St., on polygamy, 568
Paul, St., on the resurrection of the body, 650
Paul, Bishop of Antioch, account of, 160
Paul of Samosata, heresy of, 309
Paulianists, 77
Paulicians, principles of the, 552
Paulinus, St., on the use of lights, 413
Peace, kiss of, 390
Pearson, Bishop, on Christ, our mediator and judge, 462
Pearson, Bishop, on election, 232
Pearson, Bishop, on the fall of man and of the angels, 459
Pearson, Bishop, on "Incomprehensible," 339
Pearson, Bishop, on repesentation, 641
"Peculiars," 265
Pelagianism, 163, 310
Pelagius, opinions of, on original sin, 557
Penance, the three kinds of, 560
Penance, in primitive Church, 204
Penitential discipline, 639
Pentateuch, Elohistic and Jehovistic writers of, 369
Pentecost, 802
Pepuzians, 495
Perambulations, 661
Perceval, on consecration of bishops, 515
Perfectibilists, 323
Perfection, counsels of, 164
Perfection, threefold, kinds of, 165
Perkins, on Atheism, 57
Perrone, on the doctrine of satisfaction, 343
Perrone, on indulgences, 341
Perone, on Opus operatum, 524
Perpetua, St., her visions of purgatory, 601
Persecutions, chronological table of, 536
Perseverance, final, 289
Personality, incorporeal, ancient ideas of the soul as, 705
Personality of the Holy Spirit, 713
Persons, anointing of, 26
Pesachim, Tr., on Hallel, 301
Peter, St., Liturgy of, 422
Peter, St., his altar at Rome, 16
Peter, St., power of the keys committed to, 390
Phantasiastæ, 215
Philo and the Cabbala, 98, 100
Philo, on demiurge, 197
Philo, on Old Testament canon, 108
Philosophy, Greek, dualism of, 222
Philoxenian version, 109, n., 788
Photius, on Apostolical Constitutions, 149
Pietists, the, 436
Pius VI., on indulgences, 341
Pius IX., on latitudinarianism, 396, n.
Placentia, Council of, 274
Plague burials, 95, n.
Plato, dualism of, 223
Plato, his idea of doubt, 217
Plato's Logos, 805, n.
Plato and οὐσία, 532
Plato on a Divine Spirit in man, 712, n.
Plato, on the sufferings of a good man, 547, n.
Platonists, English, 396
Pliny's letter to Trajan, 9
Pliny and Christian adoration of Christ, 207
Pliny and Libellatici, 410
Pliny, on deaconesses, 185
Plotinus, Enneads of, 197
Plutarch, on Syncretism, 725
Ποιεῖν, meaning of, 252, n.
Points, five, 289
Politics, secularization of, and Atheism, 58
Polycarp, and Gloria Patri, 291
Polycarp, Gloria in Excelsis, 291

Polycarp, epistle of, 278
Polytheism, 632
Pope, cases reserved to the, 645
Popes, their claim to confer benefices, 643
Popes, precedence of in councils, 726
Porphyry, on demiurge, 197
Port-Royal, account of, 361
Porter, office of, 526
Portiforium, 90
Positive accommodation, 5
Possession, demoniacal, 198
Poverty, 166
Power, a Divine quality, 325
Power of the keys, 390
"Prædestinatus," by Sirmond, 694
Præsanctificatorum, Missa, 477
Praxeas, account of, 552
Prayer, bidding, 84
Prayer Book, Christ's divinity recognized in, 208
Prayer Book of 1549, on absolution, 4, n.
Prayer, the effect of, 583
Prayer Book, on extreme unction, 773
Prayer, The Lord's, 432
Prayer, The Lord's, and the Embolismus, 238, 433
Prayer, The Lord's, liturgical use of, 433
Prayer, objections to, 584
Prayer, the origin of, 582
Prayers for the dead, primitive practice of, 359
Prebend, origin of the, 588
Precatory absolution, 4
Predestination in Scripture, 234
Pre-existence of souls, a doctrine of Origen, 527
Presbyterians, 775
Presence of Christ, spiritual life consisting in, 461
Presence, real, 623
Presence, virtual, 623
Priest, functions of, 591
Priesthood, its existence common to all nations, 591
Priesthood, lay, 407
Priesthood, necessity for, indicated by Christ, 591
Primate, superior to ordinary archbishop, 40
Primers, 316
Primitive ceremonies of baptism, 75
Primitive Church, its theories of purgatory, 599
Primitive Church, martyrs in, 448
Primitive Church, relation of Augustinian and Pelagian doctrine to, 558
Pro-Anaphora, 424
Processions, 659
Prophecy, moral and predictive elements of, 596
Prosper, on Semi-Pelagianism, 692
Protestantism, as an historical term, 596
Protevangelium, the, 450
Prothesis, the, 424
Provincial councils, 152
Provincial councils, presbyters admitted to, 153
Provincial synods, 726
Provisors, statute of, 206, 599, 643
Prudentius, on A and Ω, 1
Psalms, Hallel, processional use of, 301
Pseudo-Jonathan, Targum of, 733
Psychological Dualism, considerations in favour of, 225
Punishment, everlasting, 258
Puritans, omission of burial services by, 95
Puritan principles, as stated by Neale, 604
Puritanism, causes of, 605
Pusey, on Lay Baptism in the early Church, 404
Pusey, on Mariolatry, 441
Pusey, on the titles given to the Blessed Virgin, 453
Pusey, on the angel of the Lord, 23, n.
Pusey, on Ultramontanism, 770
Pusey, on Unity of the Church, 776
Pyrrhonists, 217

Quadratus, apology of, 35
Quaker meetings, 608
Quakers on ritual, 653
Quesnel and Jansenism, 773
Quignonez, Cardinal, reformed breviary of, 409

Racovian Catechism, 45, n.
Radbertus, Paschasius, on Invocation of Holy Spirit in the Eucharist, 358, n.
Radbertus, Paschasius, on the Grace of the Eucharist, 249, n.
Radenhausen, on Atheism, 61
Ratherius and Anthropomorphism, 27
Rationalism, defence of, 620
Rationalism, progress of, 615
Ratisbon, Synod of, 6
Reader, Office of, 526
Real Presence, materialist views of, 762
Redemption, universal, 777
Redmayne, Dr., on Celibacy, 118, n.
Reformatio Legum, on everlasting punishment, 260, n.
Reformers on Predestination, 104, n.
Religion, Affections and, 8
Religious contract of Marriage, 443
Religious obedience, test of among Pagans, 534
Remonstrants, 48
Rénan, on Scripture criticism, 175
Repentance, elements of, 639
Responsive services and double choir, 658
Resurrection, the general, 687
Revealed religion, 633
Revelation, inspiration distinct from, 349
Revelation, mysteries necessary to, 635
Ridley on Confession, 640
Righteousness, imputed, 331
Rite, Ambrosian, 16
Rite, ceremony distinct from, 120
Rite, Roman, opposition to at Milan, 16
Ritual, general objects of, 653
Ritual, necessity of, 652
Robertson, on doubt, 220
Rogation Days, the, 274
Roman Canon, on prayers for the dead, 661, n.
Roman doctrine of Indulgence, 341
Roman doctrine of persecution, 565
Roman Empire, codex of law in, 400
Roman form of abjuration, 2
Roman form of Ave Maria, 72
Roman Law of adoption, 5
Roman Law on affinity, 9
Roman Law of canonization, 113
Roman Law on marriage, 446
Roman Ordinal on subdeacons, 716
Roman Propaganda, the, 483
Romanism, Puritan conception of, 662
Roman rite of Benediction, 82
Roman view of repentance, 640
Roman Vulgate, 790
Romanus, Clemens, epistles of, 277
Roscellin and Nominalism, 137
Rose, on rationalism, 619
Royal Supremacy, 722
Ruffinus, account of, 283
Ruffinus, his opinions, 555
Ruffinus, on recitation of creed, 170
Ruffinus, on Pope Clement, 572
Russian Church and Transubstantiation, 760

Sabbatical year, 666
Sabians and Baptism, 668
Sabians, sacred books of the, 668
Sacerdotal benediction, 82
Sacramental Matter, 458
Sacraments, Unity of the Church preserved by, 776
Sacraments, effects of the, 525
Sacraments, history of the term, 668
Sacraments, intention in the celebration of, 351
Sacraments, modes of regarding them, 525
Sacraments, mysteries connected with, 500
Sacraments number of the, 669
Sacramentaries, Missal, a development of, 479
Sacrifice, Eucharistic, 252
Sacrifice, use of Blood in, 89
Sacrifices under the Law, 679
Sacrifice, Vicarious, 792
Saints, communion of, 134
Saints, images of, 327
Saints, invocation of, 358
Saints, invocation of, in Litanies, 417
Saints, intercession of, 353
Salutation, Angelic, 22, 72
Samaritan Version, 788
Sanction, Pragmatic, 580
Sanctus, the, 736
Sanhedrin, numerical value of word, 98
Sarum, Ordo ad faciendum Catechumenum, 116
Sarum, Consuetudinary, 292
Sarum, liturgy of, 391
Sarum, use of Kyrie Eleëson, 392, n.
Satan, names and titles of, 675
Satan, nature and attributes of, 677
Satan, personality and origin of, 676
Satisfaction, an element of repentance, 640
Scandinavia, French and English missions to, 482
Scepticism and Atheism, 59
Scepticism, superstition connected with, 720
Schism of East and West, 175
Schism, Meletian, 463
Schleiermacher, on feeling, 8
Schoettgen, on the hidden manna, 621, n.
Scholastic Theology, 746
Schmalkaldic League, 70, 640
Science and Atheism, 59
Scotists, 140
Scotus, Duns, theology of, 749
Scripture, accommodation in, 4
Scripture, canon of, 107
Scripture criticism, 175
Scripture, hymns in, 318
Scripture, illustrations of fasting, 270
Scripture, use of Elohim in, 237
Sections, Ammonian, 17
Seleucia, council of, 8
Self, heart in the sense of, 303
Self-consciousness, heart used for, 303
Semler, opinions and theories of, 618
Seneca, on a divine spirit in man, 712, n.

Seneca, on conscience, 146
Seneca, on fatalism, 275
Seneca, on the benefit of suffering, 263, n.
Sensationalists, 456
Sephiroth, 99
Septuagint and the Cabbala, 98
Septuagint, true history of, 784
Seraphim, 23
Serpent, a name of Satan, 676
Servetus, account of, 775
Service-books, 659
Service, choral, 657
Shaftesbury, Lord, and Deism, 193
Shakespeare, on auricular confession, 70
Shamanism, 285
Shammai and Hillel, characters of, 313
Shammatta identical with Anathema, 19
Shepherd of Hermas, 79
Sign of the Cross, how made, 177
Sin, actual, 5
Sin after baptism, 79
Sin, death a consequence of, 186
Sin, original, 528
Sin, original, derived not imputed, 530
Sins, confession of, 141
Sirmium, council of, 162
Sismondi, on revocatiou of the Edict of Nantes, 317
Slavonic and Persian Dualism, 221
Sleidan, on Antinomianism, 30, n.
Smith, Joseph, the founder of Mormonism, 496
Societies conneeted with the Church of England, 406
Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, 484
Socinus, Faustus, account of, 703
Soerates, aceount of, 283
Socrates, on Arianism, 41
Socrates, on canon, 107
Soeratcs, on Celibaey of the Clergy, 118
Soerates, on Rcsponsive Services, 658
Socrates, on Semi-Arianism, 689, n.
Socrates, on the council of the Dedication, 689
Socrates, on the observance of Lent, 407
Solifidianism, Luther's, 30
Souls, pre-existence of, 589
Sozomen, account of, 283
Sozomen, on Anthropomorphism, 27
Special Providenee, 598
Speculative Thcology, 744
Spener, aeeount of, 567
Spinoza, on Eternity, 246
Spinoza, on Sephiroth, 100
Spinoza, Pantheism of, 539
Spinoza, system of, 707
Spirit, the, a title of our Lord, 711
Spiritual affinity, 9
Spiritual body, 91
Spiritual death, 186
Spiritual jurisdietion, 381
Statute law, 403
Stanhope, Lord, on toleration, 565
Statute of St. Mary Ottery, Devon, on processions, 659
Stephen, Bp. of Autun, on Transubstantiation, 759
Stephens' editions of Bible, 790
Strauss and mythical theory of Scripture, 502
Streaneshalch, council of, 546
Stromata, of Clemens Alex., 281
Subdeacons, duties of, 716
Submissiou, aet of, on sacred synod, 155
Succession, Apostolical, 37
Suetonius, on persecution of the Jews, 536, n.
Suffering, benefit of, 263
Sunday, Trinity, 765
Supper, Lord's, 434
Suspension, causes of, 201
Suspension, sentence of, 494
Swedenborg, account of, 724
Symeon of Thessalonica, on Trisagion, 766
Symeon of Thessalonica, on Ter Sanctus, 736
Synods, episcopal, 154
Synods, Legatine, 153
Syncreticism, 11
Syrian and Greek creeds, 172
Syriac, Peshito Version, 788
Système de la Nature of D'Holbach, 455

Tables, chronological, 125
Table, chronological, of persecutions, 536
Table, chronological, of Popes, 571
Table, chronological, of Antipopes, 33
Tables, comparative, of creeds, 171, 172, 173, 174
Table, comparative, of the four parent liturgies, 423, n., 424
Table of Quietest "Via ad Sapientiam," 612
Table of Scripture authorities for creed, 170
Table, Lord's, 434
Tacitus, on Judaism, 376
Taeitus, on the persecutions of the Christians, 536, n.
Talmud, contents of, 730
Talmud, glosses of, on the Law, 377
Talmud, works on the, 378
Talmud, on Hosanna, 314
Talmud, on penance, 560
Talmud, on Shechinah, 697
Tanaim, the, 728
Targum, use of סנהדרין in the, 673
Targumists, 123
Τάρταρος, translated "hell," 305
Tatian, diatessaron of, 201, 297
Tatian, on the "Heavenly Logos," 712
Tatian, on the Resurrection of the Body, 651
Tauler, account of, 501
Taylor, Jeremy, Bp., on contrition, 151
Taylor, Jeremy, Bp., on conseience, 146
Taylor, Jeremy, on doubt, 219
Taylor, Jeremy, on excommuuication, 20
Taylor, on the law of Christ, 404
Taylor, Jeremy, on Quietism, 611
Taylor, Jeremy, on sacraments, 339
Taylor, Jeremy, on toleration, 565
Taylor, Jeremy, on Ultramontanism, 770
Tertullian, account of, 281
Tertullian, apology of, 35
Tertullian and Anthropomorphism, 27
Tertullian, on Antichrist, 29
Tertullian, on Apostolical Suecession, 38
Tertullian and Homoousion, 44, n.
Tertullian, on authenticity, 71
Tertullian, on Baptism, 74
Tertullian, on Baptismal Grace, 79
Tertullian, ou blood, 89
Tertullian, on canon, 110
Tertullian, on canonical hours, 315
Tertullian, on Christ's divinity, 209
Tertullian, ou clergy, 130
Tertullian, on Confirmation, 144
Tertullian, on councils, 158, 159, n.
Tertullian, on degrees of bliss, 807, n.
Tertullian, on dualism, 226
Tertullian, on Early Church Councils, 111
Tertullian, on Easter, 227
Tertullian, on economy, 229
Tertullian, on faith, 18
Tertullian, on Friday fasting, 274
Tertullian, on Gnostic rejection of baptism, 78
Tertullian, on γνῶσις, 294
Tertullian, on ΙΧΘΥΣ, 360
Tertullian, on immersion, 75
Tertullian, on Infant Baptism, 345
Tertullian, ou infanticide, 535
Tertullian, on intermediate state, 354, n.
Tertullian, on kiss of peace, 390, 391
Tertullian, on Lay Baptism, 404
Tertullian and laity, 394
Tertullian, on Lay Priesthood, 407
Tertullian, on the Lord's Prayer, 432, n.
Tertullian, on marriage, 443
Tertullian, on mortal sins, 204
Tertullian, on name "Christian," 121
Tertullian, on oblation, 522
Tertullian, ou offertory, 522
Tertullian, on original sin, 530
Tertullian, on the Paschal fast, 543
Tertullian, on penance, 559
Tertullian, on personality, 566
Tertullian, on prayers for the dead, 586
Tertullian, on pre-existence of souls and matter, 590, n.
Tertullian, on procession of the Holy Ghost, 595
Tertullian, on public games, 535
Tertullian, on Purgatory, 601
Tertullian, on the Resurrection of the Body, 651
Tertullian, on rogations, 661, n.
Tertullian, on the rule of faith, 663
Tertullian, on Sacraments, 668
Tertullian, on sign of Cross, 177
Tertullian, on "the Spirit" as a title of Christ, 712
Tertullian, on spiritual jurisdiction, 382
Tertullian, on standing to pray, 392
Tertullian, on swearing by the Emperor, 535, n.
Tertullian, on term faithful, 267
Tertullian, on Traducianism, 168
Tertullian, on the Trinity, 765, n.
Tertullian, on universal redemption, 777, n.
Tertullian, on virginity, 796
Tertullian, on widows, 803
Tetrapla, 786
Thaumaturgus, St. Greg., account of, 281
Theism and atonement, 633
Theodore, account of, 492
Theodoret, account of, 283
Theodoret, examples of bigamy, 84
Theodoret, on anathema, 19
Theodoret, on Antichrist, 29
Theodoret, on Arianism, 41, n.
Theodoret, on the clergy, 130
Theodoret, on divorce, 568, n.
Theodoret, on οὐσία, 532
Theodoret, on re-ordination, 638
Theodoret, on Thcophany, 751
Theodotus, the fouuder of Monarchiauism, 486
Theodotus and Gnosticism, 42
Theology, Cabbalistic system of, 97

Theology, influence of Nonjurors on, 516
Theophanies, 23
Theophanies of Old Testament, 210
Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, apology of, 35
Theophilus, on Baptismal Grace, 79
Theophilus, on the order of the Gospels, 297, n.
Theophorus, a name of Ignatius, 125
Theophylact, on Antichrist, 29
Theophylact, on Cenobites, 119
Thirlwall, on Homeric pictures of disembodied souls, 705
Tillotson's saying on the Athanasian Creed, 49, n.
Tindal, Matthew, and Deism, 194
Tischendorf, on the order of the Gospels, 297
Tischendorf, on the Vatican Codex, 783
Toland, and Deism, 192
Toledo, Council of, 272, 286
Toplady, on universal redemption, 778
Total abstinence, 4
Tractarians and Asceticism, 53
"Tractatus Theologico-Politicus" of Spinoza, 709
Tradition, authority due to, 148
Traducianism, 168
Transfiguration, festival of the, 759
Transmigration, Buddhist, 92
Transmigration, history of, 463
Transmutation of baptismal element, 74
Transubstantiation, controversy respecting, 761
Transubstantiation, history of the term, 759
Trench, Archbp., on authenticity, 71
Trench, Archbishop, on demoniacal possession, 199
Trench, Archbishop, on parables, 540
Trent, catechism of, on eternity, 246
Trent, council of, on indulgence, 342
Trent, council of, on original sin, 531
Trent, council of, on transubstantiation, 760
Trichotomy, 706
Tridentine Catechism, on purgatory, 602
Tridentine Catechism, on re-baptism, 625
Trullo, council in, on Agapæ, 10
Trullan Council, canon of, 477, n.
Type, different to allegory, 14
Types of baptism, 74
Tyre, council of, 162
Teetotalism, 53
Temptation of Christ and Asceticism, 55
Temptation, five kinds of, 734
Temura, the, 97
Tenison, Archbishop, on excommunication, 265
Test Act, the, 513
Testament of the twelve Patriachs, 78
Testament, New, canon of, 109
Testament, New, laity in, 394
Testament, New, law of Christian prayer in, 583
Testament, New, mention of Sanhedrin in, 673
Testament, New, mention of the Shechinah in, 696
Testament, New, polygamy forbidden in, 569
Testament, New, Syriac version of, 109
Testament, New, use of the word "mysteries" in, 499
Testament, New, on Christ's Divinity, 336
Testament, Old, canon of, 107
Testament, Old, laity in, 393
Testament, Old, "Name of God" in, 504
Testament, Old, paradise in, 451
Testament, Old, prophecies of the Incarnation in, 334, n.
Testament, Old, types of Eucharist in, 247
Testament, Old, on use of images, 327
Tetzel, form of indulgence used by, 342
Teutonic race, its peculiarity, 184

Ulphilas and the Goths, 480
Uncial MSS., 176, n.
Understanding, faith partly of the, 267
Uniformity, Act of, 403
Union, Hypostatic, 337
United Brethren, 495
United States, Episcopal orders in, 485
United synods, 726
Ursinus, on Syncretism, 725
Usuard, martyrology of, 447
Utilitarianism, 634
Utrecht, Jansenist Archiepiscopal See of, 363
Utrecht, synod of, 364

Vaughan, on universal redemption, 778
Vendidad, 222
Vessels, sacred, ablution of, 2
Vicar-general, office of, 524
Victor, Hugh Saint, theology of, 747
Villemaind, on Monks, 488
Vincent of Lerins, rule of, on tradition, 116
Viret, on Deism, 190
Virgil's prediction of Christ, 699
Virgin, Blessed, Assumption of, 55
Virgin, the Blessed, moral instrument of the Incarnation, 441, 451
Virgin, Blessed, sanctity of the, 329
Virgin Mary, personal history of the Blessed, 449
Virgin Mary, present condition of, 452
Virgin Mary, theory of her mediatorial position, 453
Virginity, perpetual, of the Blessed Virgin Mary, 562
Virginia, colonization of, 483
Vision, Beatific, the final state of blessedness, 81
Visible Church, the, 129
Vocation, a name for mission, 480
Voet, on causes of Atheism, 58

Waldo, Peter, account of, 800
Walton, Christopher, on theosophy, 752
Waterland, on the Divinity of Christ, 43, n.
Wesley, John, account of, 465
Wesley, on the progress of Methodism, 466
Wesley, on separation from the Church, 467
Wesley, on the use of the Prayer Book, 469
Wesleyans, enthusiasm of the, 240
Western Church, Christology of, 124
Western Church, imposition of celibacy in, 118
Western Church, its forms of benediction, 82
Whately, Archbp., on miracles, 475
Whewell, on conscience, 147
Whitby, council at, 492
Wicked, nature of their punishment, 181
Wickliffe, teaching of, 428
Will, faith partly of the, 267
Will, free, 289
Wilberforce, on the sacrifice of Christ, 460
Williams, Archbishop, on excommunication, 265
Williams, on Mariolatry in the Greek Church, 442
Wilson, Daniel, summary of Evangelicalism, 257
Woman, creation of, 90
Women, purification of, 603
Woolston and Deism, 194
Worms, edict of, 69
Worship, fetish, 631
Worship, subjective, 521
Worship, objective, 521
Worship of Christ, 207
Worship of images, 326
Written word, the, 805

Xenophon, on tithes, 755, n.

Zinzendorf, Count, account of, 496
Zohar, book of, 96
Zonaras, on anathema, 19
Zoroaster and the Cabbala, 98
Zoroaster and Dualism, 221